THE SATURDAY EVENING POST.

Deacon & Peterson, Publishers,
NUMBER SIXTY-SIX SOUTH THIRD ST.

Two Dollars Per Annum, In Advance.
THREE DOLLARS IF NOT PAID IN ADVANCE.

HORACE DEACON, HENRY PETERSON, } EDITORS AND PROPRIETORS.

A FAMILY NEWSPAPER: NEUTRAL IN POLITICS.

CLUBS.—FOR TERMS TO CLUBS, SEE PROSPECTUS ON THIRD PAGE.

DEVOTED TO MORALITY, PURE LITERATURE, FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC NEWS, AGRICULTURE, THE COMMERCIAL INTEREST, SCIENCE, ART AND AMUSEMENT.

VOLUME XXXI. PHILADELPHIA, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 1851. WHOLE NO. 1581.

Original Poetry.

THE FADED ONE.

WRITTEN FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING POST, BY FRANCES D. GAGE.

There's deep-worn furrows on that cheek
Of sorrow and of tears,
And lines upon that once fair brow,
Not pencil'd there by years—
And yet few Summers hath she seen,
Since girlhood's gleesome hours,
When she was call'd our village queen,
Our Rose among the flowers.
And now her eye is weak and dim,
Her face all worn and old—
Her lip is pale—her once gay laugh
All spiritless and cold.

Fate both not cast her idols down
With stern, relentless will,
Parents and kindred, friends and home,
Glad her lone spirit still.
Wealth strews her outward path with flowers
Of beauty, day by day;
Life's holiest cares and dearest ties
Have bound her all the way.
The sacred name of mother, thrills
With rapturous joy her heart;
And wife, oh! oft that holy word
Has made her pulses start.
And yet her eye is sunk and dim,
Her face is worn and old—
The smile that plays upon her lip,
All spiritless and cold.

You ask the why? A common tale
It is of common life,
There is no real sympathy
Between the man and wife.
His years would twice have numbered hers,
And still her father smiled,
The world said 'twas a goodly match,
For such an artless child.
Her mother's heart beat high with pride,
(His was an honor'd name)
She said her loved, her only child,
For fortune and for fame.
Aye—said that young and guileless heart
To one all stern and cold—
And chained her free young spirit down
With glittering links of gold.

She loves the flowers, he loves them not—
The birds that charm her ear,
For him wake discord; his cold thoughts
Fill all her soul with fear.
The glad free laugh he seemed to love,
When she was not his own—
Soon grew beneath his cold rebuke
An almost waiting moan.
The harp-strings of her inner life,
So tuned to happiness,
A gentle finger might have play'd
And brought forth strains of bliss;
But on those strings, from day to day,
Discordant notes he plays,
And wonders that they give him back
Such dull unmeaning lays.
Oh! had a warm and loving hand
Those quivering strings have played,
It might, through all life's weary years,
Sweet harmonies have made.

But now each key and chord is jarred
With every passing hour,
Till the sole instrument is marred
By discord's withering power.
This is the why her eye is dim,
Her face so worn and old,
Her lip so pale, her once gay laugh
So spiritless and cold.

* * * *

All ye who read this simple tale,
Pause ere it be too late;
Better to live through life unwed,
Than tempt so dire a fate.
Love, only love, can keep the chain
Of human bright and fair;
Without it, every link must be
Corroded with despair.
No soldier, timeless, harder toil,
For human hearts can be,
Than thus to live a wedded life,
Unblest by sympathy.

Mount Airy, Nov. 1, 1851.

Original Novelet.

THE DISCARDED DAUGHTER; OR, THE CHILDREN OF THE ISLE.

WRITTEN FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING POST, BY MRS. EMMA D. E. N. SOUTHWORTH, AUTHOR OF "SHANNONDALE," "THE DESERTED WIFE," &c., &c.

[Entered according to the Act of Congress, by Deacon & Peterson, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania.]

CHAPTER VIII.

THE MOTHER'S TRIAL.

Yet haply there will come a weary day,
When overtasked at length,
Both Love and Hope beneath the weight give way;
Then with a statue's smile, a statue's strength,
Stands the stone sister. Patient, nothing loth,
And both supporting does the work of both.
Coleridge.

I hope that you have not forgotten the order of time, in the long, retrospective episode, into which I have been led.

It is now twelve years since the marriage of Alice Chandler and General Garnet, and six months since the departure of Hugh Hutton and Agnes upon their sea-voyage.

General Garnet is absent on an electioneering tour, but daily expected back.

It is June, and the scene is the terrace, in front of Mount Calm. There are four persons upon the terrace.

Alice couple's a rustic seat, under the shadow of a locust tree. She is still a most beautiful woman, very delicate, almost sylph like, with her fair, blonde beauty, and airy, while muslin wrapper. She is calmly perusing a piece of fine, white, knitting-work—that favorite, busy illustration of all Maryland ladies. At her feet is a very small basket, containing her keys, and the ball of lamb's wool yarn, from which she knits. Near her stands a young, mulatto hand-maid, of about ten years of age.

Lower down, upon a step of the terrace, sits her daughter Alice, or Elsie, as she was called, for distinction's sake. Elsie is now a very beautiful child, promising to be much more beautiful than her mother had ever been. She strangely united the most beautiful features of both parents. She had the delicate, Grecian features, fair, roseate complexion, golden hair, and blue eyes of her mother, with the passionate, veiled gaze, and bewildering smile of her father. She has a finer vital and sanguine temperament than either could have possessed—is more rounded form, more elastic motion, a more joyous expression, a more gladsome radiance in her speech, and in her laughter! Elsie sat sketching an elm tree from nature—the tree stood before her at some distance on the lawn. She was bending over her drawing-board, that rested on her lap, until her fair ringlets almost concealed her rosy cheeks. She also wore a simple, white muslin dress, that harmonized well with her blooming beauty. Behind her, bending over her, stood a youth of sixteen, but for height, for breadth of shoulders, and depth of chest, and manly and beautifying its heavy strength, gracefully as foliage shades rock. He seemed to have just returned from gunning, for he wore a dress of forest green, his cap lay at his feet, his pointers were near, and one hand rested upon a fowling-piece, while with the other, he pointed alternately to the elm tree and the drawing, giving Elsie some instruction in her work. His dark, gray eyes, full of thought, truth and affection, were fixed upon her.

[illegible] for twenty years of age. He was a keen [illegible] boy, with bright, chestnut hair very handsome [illegible] 'en brave, and relieving and waving around a [illegible]

And while they pursued their work, Alice, from her rustic seat, watched them. Alice, looking as serenely happy, as though her heart had never been broken, her brain never been crazed—by calamity, anguish and despair, verging upon madness, as a beautiful, amiable, and self-possessed, as though she had never sworn, in her frenzy, that she could not survive the severance from Sinclair—that neither moral, intellectual, nor physical nature could stand the test—the misery of a life with Garnet.

But Divine Providence is kind, and nature is full of remedial power. We have all strength given us according to our need. If our joys are greater in anticipation than in realization, so certainly are our sorrows.

Alice, in the terrible storm of passion that had temporarily dethroned her reason, believed that she could not outlive her marriage—yet she had lived twelve years, and was comparatively happy—possibly happier than many a girl who had married for love, or its semblance.

It is true, that from the hour she awoke from the strange torpor that immediately followed her marriage, her religious principles had taught her to turn from the memory of Sinclair, whenever that memory recurred. She prayed against it, strove against it, wrenched her thoughts forcibly from it, and riveted them to something else. And her prayers and struggles had produced this happy effect—the image of Sinclair had faded away with the brightest visions of her girlhood. And now that that typhoon of youthful passion had long passed, and even its memory had almost faded away—her gentle, affectionate, religious nature made her happy. With such a nature, Alice could not live without forming attachments to those around her. He must have been a terrible brute who could not have been blessed with some portion of her affection, by simply living in the house with her for twelve years. And General Garnet was not exactly a brute. He was very handsome, graceful, and accomplished, always well dressed, and habitually polite. And now that time had long worn out his jealousy, he had ceased all unfounded and ungenerous like interference with his wife's especially feminine occupations and associations. Alice was happy with her housekeeping, her garden, her dairy, her country neighbors, her favorite Magnus, and her little daughter. Yet! had the Angel of Destiny whispered to her heart this alternative—"Your daughter! two fates avail her—to die in her childhood, or live to be an unwilling bride—choose for her!" Alice would have answered with a shudder, and with but a moment's hesitation, "Let her die in her childhood rather! Let her die now rather!" And to have saved her from the misery of wedding one she could not love, Alice would have been content to lay her heart's only treasure—her idolized child in the grave.

But no such question of Destiny had yet called back the memory of the past, and Alice was happy as the instrument in Ambrosia's needle, and smiled at the boy and girl on the terrace.

At last the sketch was finished, and Magnus pronounced it perfect, and threw his shoulders back with a yawn of relief, and brought his hands together with a ring, exclaiming, as he turned to Alice,

"Now, cousin, let me order the horses, and let us ride at once to the beach. I have a fine boat there, and can put you and Elsie over to Hutton Isle in less than no time, so that you will have two or three hours to spend there to see about—what was it you wanted to see about, cousin Alice?"

"Getting some fine wool dyed for striping yarn counterpanes."

"Oh! and 'Aunt Joe' has the receipt!—exactly! Well, we can gallop to the beach in fifteen minutes, and I can put you over to the isle in half an hour, so that you will have plenty of time!"

"Mamma only wants to go over and cheer the old lady," said Elsie, with an arch smile.

"Indeed, I want some wool dyed bright scarlet and light blue for my fall counterpanes," insisted the lady.

Magnus looked up incredulously, his look meaning to say,

"I thought good housekeepers like you, cousin, always had wool dyed at home!"

Alice answered the saucy look by saying,

"My maids are all very busy—with carding, and spinning, and knitting, and weaving, they have enough to keep them closely employed until preserving time, so that I am really necessitated to get Miss Joe to dye my wool," and smiling, Alice rolled up her knitting, dropped it into the basket, which was immediately raised by the little maid, and turned to enter the house, followed by the latter.

"You must have the horses saddled and before the door by the time mamma and I get our habits on, Magnus," said Elsie, taking up her drawing board, and preparing to follow her mother.

"Stop!—here's Goliah come from the post office—with a letter, too—" interrupted Magnus, going down the terrace steps to the shaded avenue to meet the boy. Mrs. Garnet stayed to receive it.

"It is from the General, madam," said Magnus, receiving the letter from the boy, and handing it to Alice. She opened and glanced through it. Then turning to the expectant child, she said,

"Elsie, your father will be home this evening. He will bring with him Judge Wylie, Mr. Ulysses Wylie, Mr. Hardcastle, and Mr. Lionel Hardcastle. He requests me to have supper ready for the party. So, children, you will have to ride without me this evening."

"Oh! I'm so sorry, mamma! I'm so sorry, cousin Alice!" simultaneously exclaimed the girl and the boy, catching each a hand of hers, and looking coaxingly in her face.

She was so like a child herself, with her slight girlish figure, fair ringlets, and blooming face.

"Let us stay home with you!" said both, pleadingly.

"Nonsense, dear children! Go! See about my wool-dying. Ask good Miss Joe when she can color twenty pounds each of light blue and bright scarlet wool for me. I would like you to take her something, only she has so much nervous independence—her pride and temper so quickly take offence. And I'll tell you how you may console yourselves for the loss of my company. Call at Tecomoco—you have plenty of time, and take Ambrosia with you, and bring her home with you. I will send for Diogenes, with his fiddle, and you shall have a moonlight dance on the lawn, while the gentlemen are settling the affairs of the universe in the drawing-room," said Alice, gayly, and kissing her hand to them both, she sprang into the house.

Alice was soon busy superintending the provisions for supper. She had a good deal of the pride of the housekeeper and the hostess about her. Every Maryland woman has.

Meantime Magnus and Elsie mounted and rode away, down the leafy avenue, heavy green, and fresh with the exuberant luxuriousness of midsummer; past the porter's lodge from which old Mrs. Brown looked out to smile upon them; down the steep, dense, forest-covered descent of the hill, through the thicket in the bottom; over the rich, green, grassy, undulating fields, extending towards Huntstown; and, lastly, along the gravelly beach of the bright sea-shore towards Tecomoco Point.

They found Judge Wylie among his "raft of girls and boys" as he called them—but booted and spurred for a ride to Huntstown to meet General Garnet and a party of gentlemen with whom he was going to Mount Calm.

Magnus had no difficulty in getting Ambrosia to join the party, only there was no horse up, and it was too late to catch one. All things, under Judge Wylie's agricultural jurisdiction, was in a very irregular, loose, holter-skelter state. Negroes, who was always prompt in an emergency, took Amber up behind him, and so they rode down to the landing.

Magnus tied the horses to a tree, put the girls in a skiff, took the oar, and, gliding over the sunny waters, soon reached the sandy beach of Hutton Isle.

Old Pontius Pilate was sitting on a turned up boat, with his elbows on his knees, and his woolly head dropped into his open palms, in an attitude of deep distress.

"What's the matter, Post?" inquired Magnus.

A heavy groan convulsed Post's big bosom, and without raising his head, he answered,

"Don't ax me, sar, please! Ole mist', up dar, in heap o' 'fliction! 'dred she is, sar!"

"Who, Miss Joe?" asked Elsie, sympathetically.

"Yes, honey! Yes, Miss Easy! Ole mist' very much starved in her mind, 'dead, Gor A'mighty knows is she, honey!"

"What's it about?" asked Ambrosia, awe-stricken.

"Your cousing, Marse Ursines Roebuck, jes left here, honey! May-be he' tell yer! I hasn't seen ole mist' in so much 'stress since de good horn button was los'. Don't like to say nuthin', 'dead I don't, honey! Don't like to starve your min', 'dead I don't, honey!"

"Let's go on to the house and see what's the matter," said Magnus, impatiently leading the way.

The girls hurried after him, full of anxiety and conjecture. They found Miss Joe in a deal of affliction. She was seated at her loom wearing a domestic carpet of gay plaid pattern, and driving the shuttle with the energetic force and electric speed of desperation. Her face was red and swollen and moist, and as she saw her guests enter, she picked up a checked handkerchief already wet with tears or something, and applying it to her nose, blew it with a resounding trumpet like report, giving it at the same time a most desperate wring, that left that misused feature as large and purple as a little egg-plant, and turned to meet her visitors. Such a comical face! with such a swollen nose, and such red and fiery eyes! Mirth strove with pity in the bosoms of the young party—they could scarcely keep from laughing, though they would not have laughed for all the world.

"How do you do, Miss Joe?" said Magnus, in behalf of his party.

"Don't tell me how I do?" exclaimed Miss Joe, blowing and wringing her unfortunate proboscis worse than before, and tearing it bigger and redder; "don't tell me how I do!—I'm ruined! I ruined! I ruined!"

"Ruined?"

"Yes, ruined! Nothing less than just that!"

"Why, what on earth has happened?"

"Everything has happened! Magnus, boy, don't keep digging your boot toe into my yeth floor; it 'stroys all my time to level and beat it down again!"

Magnus immediately desisted, and stamped the clay hard again.

"Has anything happened to Captain Hutton or his wife?" inquired Magnus, pursuing his investigations.

"Oh, no! Lord, no! Oh, dear me! Oh, my Lord! What shall I do! What will become of me! I shall be on the parish yet, I know I shall! After all my striving and 'tiling, I shall come to the poor house yet, I know I shall! though where I could find a poorer house than this, just this minute, I'm sure I don't know! Oh, Lord! Oh, dear! Oh, dear! Oh, Lord!"

"What is the matter, Miss Joe?—can we do nothing for you?" asked Ambrosia, going to her side, and looking compassionately up in her tempestuous face. "I can certainly assist you, Miss Joe, in some way, can't I?" she persisted, anxiously.

"Oh, dear! Oh, Lord! Oh, Lord! Oh, dear! Yes, you can!—I—oh, my blessed Lord! I—have been thinking of blacking my face, and striping my hair, and hiring myself out for a nigger, when the worst comes to the worst!—And maybe your ga might want a field-hand in harvest time!"

Ambrosia doubted Miss Joe's sanity and her own personal safety, and walked away from her.

"Will you not tell us what has occurred? I am certain something can be done for you," said Magnus, as vague notions of debt and executions floated through his brain.

"No, nothing can't be done," said Miss Joe, with a third agonizing renewal and wrench.

"Don't twist your poor dear nose so, Miss Joe—please don't! Indeed, it hurts my feelings!" said Ambrosia, with a sympathetic shudder, caressing her own little peg nose; "don't, Miss Joe! father will pay the debt, if it is a debt!" she added, ever ready to promise her father's all-bountiful charity.

"Let my nose alone, and pay your own debts!" was the sharp retort; then—"Sit down, Magnus, sit down, Elsie, sit down, Ambrosia, and I'll see if the Lord will give me strength to tell my trouble-ion. Magnus, don't lean back with your chair against the wall: you make the back legs dig holes in the floor if you do! Why can't you sit genteelly, like the girls do? I declare, I had as lief have a horse in my house as a young man!"

"It is very bad in the young men to trouble you so, Miss Joe," said saucy Magnus!

"Yes, it is dreadful! they none of them ever come here without breaking and 'stroying everything!"

"Shocking!"

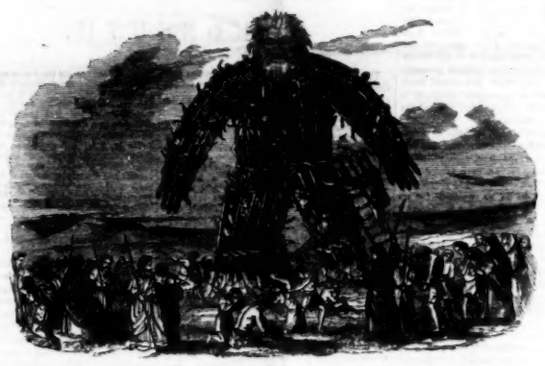
"Yes, it is. Children! I'm going to try—oh, dear me!—to tell you my troubles, for your own good!—for a lesson to you! Oo—oo—oo the—the—the unstability of human affairs, and the vanity of human expectations! I'm ruined, children! utterly ruined, at my time of life, after striving and 'tiling for 'the things that perish in the using'! Oh, my Lord! Well, as I was a sitting here this morning quite airy, laboring at my loom, in comes that long-backed, long-legged Unclean Rushcuch."

"My cousin!" exclaimed Ambrosia, opening her eyes to their fullest extent.

"Yes, Miss Amber, your cousin! I don't want to hurt your feelings, child, but he was your cousin!—which, after all, people ain't accountable for the misconduct of their relation, nyther in this world, nor the next. Well, he'd come over here shooting, which I never made any objections to, though I considered it overmuch-able. Well, he comes in here, and bobbing his head to me by way of how-do-you-do, he pitches down his cap and his gun, to the risk of its going off and shooting me, and bestrides himself with his long legs up to the fire-place, saying as it was cold on this iceberg of an old island, even in Summer. Yes, he called our little young isle 'old island,' as if it was a full-grown old veteran like Kent Island, and spoke besides vicious, as though he thought ago a disgrace.—Well, I puts up with his slapping his hat down, and pitching his gun about in that dangerous way, and feeling a sort o' pity for the chilly creeter, I went and pitched some brush on the fire, to make it burn, and takes my pipe—oh, Lord! oh, dear!—there! I knew I should break right down! Oh, dear! Well, I takes my pipe out of my mouth, and lays it carefully upon the jaws down the step, dense, forest-covered descent of the hill, through the thicket in the bottom; over the rich, green, grassy, undulating fields, extending towards Huntstown; and, lastly, along the gravelly beach of the bright sea-shore towards Tecomoco Point.

They found Judge Wylie among his "raft of girls and boys" as he called them—but booted and spurred for a ride to Huntstown to meet

Our Picture Gallery.



THE ISLANDERS FILLING A WICKER IMAGE WITH HUMAN VICTIMS AND COMBUSTIBLE MATERIALS.

Not many centuries ago, there existed a people, on a certain island, who were very ignorant, superstitious and cruel. They lived in rude huts, made by driving stakes into the earth, and covering them with the branches of trees. They were clad in the skins of wild beasts, tattooed their bodies, subsisted by fishing and hunting, and on the flesh and milk of their cattle, and were unacquainted with the institution of marriage. We cannot ascertain that they excelled in any art, except in that of making wicker baskets. Their religion had no tendency to elevate their character, for they believed in the transmigration of souls, and worshipped the sun, the moon, and deified men. Their religious ceremonies were performed in shady groves, or in rude temples of huge, rough stones, without roofs, the ruins of which are still to be seen. Cæsar, in his Commentaries, informs us that one of their religious ceremonies consisted in making, of wicker work, a hollow image of a man, about sixty feet in height, filling it with living men, women and children, setting it on fire, and seeing these unhappy victims perish in the flames. Lucan, in describing one of their sacred groves, says,—"Nothing was to be seen there but multitudes of altars, on which they sacrifice human victims." Says Pliny, "They consider it a part of their most solemn and most obligatory religion to put men to death; and to feed on their dead bodies they esteem most wholesome."

Such was their condition; yet they were not the dark sons of Ham, nor could their degradation be attributed to the influence of climate.—THEY HAVE WITHOUT THE BIBLE. A few of these white sons of barbarism were brought to Rome, and sold in the public market as slaves. Some zealous Christians in that city took an interest in their welfare, and established a mission on their native island. Numbers were soon converted to Christianity, the Bible was translated into their language, schools were established, the arts and sciences brought, mind elevated, the social and moral feelings cultivated, and soon these barbarous tribes became a great, a noble, and enlightened people. The influence of their power, enterprise and benevolence is felt in every part of the world.

Do you ask who these people are? They are the descendants of the Ancient Britons, millions of whom now inhabit the Island of Great Britain and these United States. Give the heathen the Bible, and it will do for them what it has done for us.

CHAPTER IX.

LETTERS.

When absent for from those we love,
Is there a charm the heart can fetter;
When years roll on and still we rove,
Is there no cure? oh, yes!—a letter!
Anon.

They live, they speak, they breathe what love inspires,
Warm from the soul and faithful to its fires,
Speed the dear intercourse from soul to soul,
And waft a sigh from Indus to the Pole.
Pope.

It was a bright evening near the last of October. The mail had just come in, and brought Alice letters, to gladden her heart for many months. There was a letter from Magnus—that strong, confident, joyous Magnus, who always saw so much good and glory in the future. And there was one post-marked London, and chirography—Belle Agnus,"—from Elsie—that healthful, hopeful, happy Elsie, who always made the best of everything, and was gladsome everywhere. No letter could be more replete with the tenderest, filial affection than hers, yet there was not a word of home-sickness, or sorrow, or discontent in it. It was full of genial life, of happy love, and confident hope. It contained nothing to sadden, and everything to gladden her mother.—"Our voyage out was very pleasant, dear mother; the ocean was very grand. I saw the sun rise and set upon it. It was very glorious. This great world is very magnificent, dear mother, and so blessed to me, because you are in it," she wrote. Again, "Tell Magnus he would laugh at my first impressions of England! I was disappointed in great England—how be it spoken! The world-renowned Thames! not to be compared with our own Potomac, which is certainly not considered a great river in America. England seems to me to be a small, elaborately finished, extremely well filled country; not grand, rough brown, and half furnished, like our own native land."

Then her letter was full of the child's innocent, caressing, most sincere flattery. "Beautiful mother, are your cheeks rosy now? Is your hair curling now? When I left you, your cheeks were very pale and your hair half out of curl. You looked like a pale blush rose, faded in the rain. I too was weeping, hanging on you like a half-drowned, disconsolate little rose bud. But I am very frank and bright again—strong, saucy, fearless Elsie, and it will do for them what it has done for us.

"Do you remember St. Rosalie, the beautiful, the beloved of Sicilia—

"'Where darling of each heart and eye,
From all the ports of Sicily—
St. Rosalie returned to God.'

How strange that the artist's beautiful ideal should be realized in your living face, mamma!" Her letter closed very tenderly—"Kiss father a hundred times for me, dear mamma; tell him that my next letter shall be to him, and that I intend to come home very accomplished, not to disappoint his pride. Love me very joyfully, dear, beautiful mamma, for I am your busy, happy, loving little Elsie."

Alice kissed the loving letter again and again, and walked about, happy, restless, overjoyed.—General Garnet was away from home again, as he was about half the time. And Alice, after she had read the welcome letter to all the confidential servants who loved little Elsie—behaving herself—by way of expending some of the extra life she had received—of going over to see Miss Joe, and telling the old lady that her nephew's vessel was in port, for that she had got letters by it. She knew the old soul would also be delighted to hear from Elsie.

Alice summoned Diogenes, told him to gear up the one-horse chaise, and take her over to Huttontown. The chaise was soon ready. Alice entered it, and was driven by Diogenes over to the village. She left the chaise at the Neptune Inn, back one, once used as a dressing room, was now appropriated to Elsie as her own apartment.

Alice entered her chamber, but weary as she was she could not rest—she could not even breathe freely. She took off her tight dress, and threw on a loose, white wrapper, and walked about uneasily. Presently she paused into her daughter's chamber. She glided to Elsie's bedside. The child was sleeping sweetly—her rosy cheek resting upon her golden hair—her rosy arms thrown over her head, and almost breathing themselves, they seemed so full of life and warmth. With a gush of tenderness, Alice stooped over her beautiful child, pressing kisses on her hair, on her clothes—longing to press the full rosy lips, but lest she should disturb the happy sleeper. She dropped on her knees by her side, and spreading her arms over her, raised her eyes to Heaven in mournful love and prayer. And there she kneeled, watching her beautiful and happy sleeper, and breathing blessings upon her, until the step of General Garnet sounded on the stairs, when she arose, lightly kissed her brow, and glided away.

Stilling the mighty hunger of her heart,

As Alice left the chamber of her child, it occurred to her, for the first time in her life, strangely to oppose her husband's will.

As she re-entered her own room, General Garnet was standing before the mirror, taking off his cravat.

He turned around with one of his fascinating smiles, as she went up to his side, and raised her eyes pleadingly to his.

"Well, Alice, what is it?"

"I came to say something to you about your project of sending to look away. She is too young, poor little thing, to be sent away from home, to such a great distance, and among native strangers—it will break her heart almost, indeed it will! Or else her affections will be wasted from us, and her heart grow as hard, as hard and cold! Oh! do not send her away from all she loves, so suddenly. The discomfort of the head is not all in all for a girl,—the heart has some claims—I think the greatest claims." And so she talked, and pleaded, and wept—thinking that because General Garnet listened to her with attention, she was making some impression.

But General Garnet was a gentleman who could smile the most polished scarity of manner, with the most cruel inflexibility of purpose.

At the end of all Alice's arguments, tears and prayers, he let her know, in the most polite manner possible, that her experience was very limited—her opinions, therefore, very erroneous, and her view of the present question entirely wrong. Finally, that his purpose remained, and would remain, unchanged. And Alice retired with one dread thought like nightmare oppressing her heart and brain—the thought that very soon the ocean would divide her from her child for a long, indefinite number of years.

In the course of the month their departure took place from the neighborhood.

Elsie Garnet, with many tears, left her for English school, under the protection of the American Minister to the Court of St. James.

Lionel Hardcastle sailed as Midshipman aboard the United States ship Falcon.

And Magnus Hardcastle, taking a most affectionate leave of his beautiful friend, Alice, and promising many letters, left for Baltimore, to enter upon the study of medical science, in the office of a distinguished physician.

CHAPTER IX.

LETTERS.

When absent far from those we love,
Is there a charm the heart can fetter;
When years roll on and still we rove,
Is there no cure? oh, yes!—a letter!
Anon.

They live, they speak, they breathe what love inspires,
Warm from the soul and faithful to its fires,
Speed the dear intercourse from soul to soul,
And waft a sigh from Indus to the Pole.
Pope.

It was a bright evening near the last of October. The mail had just come in, and brought Alice letters, to gladden her heart for many months. There was a letter from Magnus—that strong, confident, joyous Magnus, who always saw so much good and glory in the future. And there was one post-marked London, and chirography—Belle Agnus,"—from Elsie—that healthful, hopeful, happy Elsie, who always made the best of everything, and was gladsome everywhere. No letter could be more replete with the tenderest, filial affection than hers, yet there was not a word of home-sickness, or sorrow, or discontent in it. It was full of genial life, of happy love, and confident hope. It contained nothing to sadden, and everything to gladden her mother.—"Our voyage out was very pleasant, dear mother; the ocean was very grand. I saw the sun rise and set upon it. It was very glorious. This great world is very magnificent, dear mother, and so blessed to me, because you are in it," she wrote. Again, "Tell Magnus he would laugh at my first impressions of England! I was disappointed in great England—how be it spoken! The world-renowned Thames! not to be compared with our own Potomac, which is certainly not considered a great river in America. England seems to me to be a small, elaborately finished, extremely well filled country; not grand, rough brown, and half furnished, like our own native land."

Then her letter was full of the child's innocent, caressing, most sincere flattery. "Beautiful mother, are your cheeks rosy now? Is your hair curling now? When I left you, your cheeks were very pale and your hair half out of curl. You looked like a pale blush rose, faded in the rain. I too was weeping, hanging on you like a half-drowned, disconsolate little rose bud. But I am very frank and bright again—strong, saucy, fearless Elsie, and it will do for them what it has done for us.

"Do you remember St. Rosalie, the beautiful, the beloved of Sicilia—

"'Where darling of each heart and eye,
From all the ports of Sicily—
St. Rosalie returned to God.'

How strange that the artist's beautiful ideal should be realized in your living face, mamma!" Her letter closed very tenderly—"Kiss father a hundred times for me, dear mamma; tell him that my next letter shall be to him, and that I intend to come home very accomplished, not to disappoint his pride. Love me very joyfully, dear, beautiful mamma, for I am your busy, happy, loving little Elsie."

Alice kissed the loving letter again and again, and walked about, happy, restless, overjoyed.—General Garnet was away from home again, as he was about half the time. And Alice, after she had read the welcome letter to all the confidential servants who loved little Elsie—behaving herself—by way of expending some of the extra life she had received—of going over to see Miss Joe, and telling the old lady that her nephew's vessel was in port, for that she had got letters by it. She knew the old soul would also be delighted to hear from Elsie.

Alice summoned Diogenes, told him to gear up the one-horse chaise, and take her over to Huttontown. The chaise was soon ready. Alice entered it, and was driven by Diogenes over to the village. She left the chaise at the Neptune Inn, back one, once used as a dressing room, was now appropriated to Elsie as her own apartment.

Alice entered her chamber, but weary as she was she could not rest—she could not even breathe freely. She took off her tight dress, and threw on a loose, white wrapper, and walked about uneasily. Presently she paused into her daughter's chamber. She glided to Elsie's bedside. The child was sleeping sweetly—her rosy cheek resting upon her golden hair—her rosy arms thrown over her head, and almost breathing themselves, they seemed so full of life and warmth. With a gush of tenderness, Alice stooped over her beautiful child, pressing kisses on her hair, on her clothes—longing to press the full rosy lips, but lest she should disturb the happy sleeper. She dropped on her knees by her side, and spreading her arms over her, raised her eyes to Heaven in mournful love and prayer. And there she kneeled, watching her beautiful and happy sleeper, and breathing blessings upon her, until the step of General Garnet sounded on the stairs, when she arose, lightly kissed her brow, and glided away.

Stilling the mighty hunger of her heart,

As Alice left the chamber of her child, it occurred to her, for the first time in her life, strangely to oppose her husband's will.

As she re-entered her own room, General Garnet was standing before the mirror, taking off his cravat.

He turned around with one of his fascinating smiles, as she went up to his side, and raised her eyes pleadingly to his.

"Well, Alice, what is it?"

"I came to say something to you about your project of sending to look away. She is too young, poor little thing, to be sent away from home, to such a great distance, and among native strangers—it will break her heart almost, indeed it will! Or else her affections will be wasted from us, and her heart grow as hard, as hard and cold! Oh! do not send her away from all she loves, so suddenly. The discomfort of the head is not all in all for a girl,—the heart has some claims—I think the greatest claims." And so she talked, and pleaded, and wept—thinking that because General Garnet listened to her with attention, she was making some impression.

But General Garnet was a gentleman who could smile the most polished scarity of manner, with the most cruel inflexibility of purpose.

At the end of all Alice's arguments, tears and prayers, he let her know, in the most polite manner possible, that her experience was very limited—her opinions, therefore, very erroneous, and her view of the present question entirely wrong. Finally, that his purpose remained, and would remain, unchanged. And Alice retired with one dread thought like nightmare oppressing her heart and brain—the thought that very soon the ocean would divide her from her child for a long, indefinite number of years.

In the course of the month their departure took place from the neighborhood.

Elsie Garnet, with many tears, left for her English school, under the protection of the American Minister to the Court of St. James.

Lionel Hardcastle sailed as Midshipman aboard the United States ship Falcon.

And Magnus Hardcastle, taking a most affectionate leave of his beautiful friend, Alice, and promising many letters, left for Baltimore, to enter upon the study of medical science, in the office of a distinguished physician.

CHAPTER IX.

LETTERS.

When absent far from those we love,
Is there a charm the heart can fetter;
When years roll on and still we rove,
Is there no cure? oh, yes!—a letter!
Anon.

They live, they speak, they breathe what love inspires,
Warm from the soul and faithful to its fires,
Speed the dear intercourse from soul to soul,
And waft a sigh from Indus to the Pole.
Pope.

It was a bright evening near the last of October. The mail had just come in, and brought Alice letters, to gladden her heart for many months. There was a letter from Magnus—that strong, confident, joyous Magnus, who always saw so much good and glory in the future. And there was one post-marked London, and chirography—Belle Agnus,"—from Elsie—that healthful, hopeful, happy Elsie, who always made the best of everything, and was gladsome everywhere. No letter could be more replete with the tenderest, filial affection than hers, yet there was not a word of home-sickness, or sorrow, or discontent in it. It was full of genial life, of happy love, and confident hope. It contained nothing to sadden, and everything to gladden her mother.—"Our voyage out was very pleasant, dear mother; the ocean was very grand. I saw the sun rise and set upon it. It was very glorious. This great world is very magnificent, dear mother, and so blessed to me, because you are in it," she wrote. Again, "Tell Magnus he would laugh at my first impressions of England! I was disappointed in great England—how be it spoken! The world-renowned Thames! not to be compared with our own Potomac, which is certainly not considered a great river in America. England seems to me to be a small, elaborately finished, extremely well filled country; not grand, rough brown, and half furnished, like our own native land."

Then her letter was full of the child's innocent, caressing, most sincere flattery. "Beautiful mother, are your cheeks rosy now? Is your hair curling now? When I left you, your cheeks were very pale and your hair half out of curl. You looked like a pale blush rose, faded in the rain. I too was weeping, hanging on you like a half-drowned, disconsolate little rose bud. But I am very frank and bright again—strong, saucy, fearless Elsie, and it will do for them what it has done for us.

"Do you remember St. Rosalie, the beautiful, the beloved of Sicilia—

"'Where darling of each heart and eye,
From all the ports of Sicily—
St. Rosalie returned to God.'

How strange that the artist's beautiful ideal should be realized in your living face, mamma!" Her letter closed very tenderly—"Kiss father a hundred times for me, dear mamma; tell him that my next letter shall be to him, and that I intend to come home very accomplished, not to disappoint his pride. Love me very joyfully, dear, beautiful mamma, for I am your busy, happy, loving little Elsie."

Alice kissed the loving letter again and again, and walked about, happy, restless, overjoyed.—General Garnet was away from home again, as he was about half the time. And Alice, after she had read the welcome letter to all the confidential servants who loved little Elsie—behaving herself—by way of expending some of the extra life she had received—of going over to see Miss Joe, and telling the old lady that her nephew's vessel was in port, for that she had got letters by it. She knew the old soul would also be delighted to hear from Elsie.

Alice summoned Diogenes, told him to gear up the one-horse chaise, and take her over to Huttontown. The chaise was soon ready. Alice entered it, and was driven by Diogenes over to the village. She left the chaise at the Neptune Inn, back one, once used as a dressing room, was now appropriated to Elsie as her own apartment.

Alice entered her chamber, but weary as she was she could not rest—she could not even breathe freely. She took off her tight dress, and threw on a loose, white wrapper, and walked about uneasily. Presently she paused into her daughter's chamber. She glided to Elsie's bedside. The child was sleeping sweetly—her rosy cheek resting upon her golden hair—her rosy arms thrown over her head, and almost breathing themselves, they seemed so full of life and warmth. With a gush of tenderness, Alice stooped over her beautiful child, pressing kisses on her hair, on her clothes—longing to press the full rosy lips, but lest she should disturb the happy sleeper. She dropped on her knees by her side, and spreading her arms over her, raised her eyes to Heaven in mournful love and prayer. And there she kneeled, watching her beautiful and happy sleeper, and breathing blessings upon her, until the step of General Garnet sounded on the stairs, when she arose, lightly kissed her brow, and glided away.

Stilling the mighty hunger of her heart,

As Alice left the chamber of her child, it occurred to her, for the first time in her life, strangely to oppose her husband's will.

As she re-entered her own room, General Garnet was standing before the mirror, taking off his cravat.

He turned around with one of his fascinating smiles, as she went up to his side, and raised her eyes pleadingly to his.

"Well, Alice, what is it?"

"I came to say something to you about your project of sending to look away. She is too young, poor little thing, to be sent away from home, to such a great distance, and among native strangers—it will break her heart almost, indeed it will! Or else her affections will be wasted from us, and her heart grow as hard, as hard and cold! Oh! do not send her away from all she loves, so suddenly. The discomfort of the head is not all in all for a girl,—the heart has some claims—I think the greatest claims." And so she talked, and pleaded, and wept—thinking that because General Garnet listened to her with attention, she was making some impression.

But General Garnet was a gentleman who could smile the most polished scarity of manner, with the most cruel inflexibility of purpose.

At the end of all Alice's arguments, tears and prayers, he let her know, in the most polite manner possible, that her experience was very limited—her opinions, therefore, very erroneous, and her view of the present question entirely wrong. Finally, that his purpose remained, and would remain, unchanged. And Alice retired with one dread thought like nightmare oppressing her heart and brain—the thought that very soon the ocean would divide her from her child for a long, indefinite number of years.

In the course of the month their departure took place from the neighborhood.

Elsie Garnet, with many tears, left for her English school, under the protection of the American Minister to the Court of St. James.

Lionel Hardcastle sailed as Midshipman aboard the United States ship Falcon.

And Magnus Hardcastle, taking a most affectionate leave of his beautiful friend, Alice, and

"Do you see very high, 'dear, Miss Ally! And dis ole nigger can't swim no more on a cork!"

"Is this so?" asked Alice, with trouble on her face.

"Yes, it is so!" replied Miss Joe, "but just wait half an hour, honey, till the sun sets—then the wind 'll be sure to lay just as sudden as it ris."

Alice sat down trembling.

"If the General should come back and find me gone, he will be so vexed," she murmured, almost unconsciously.

"General Garnet better behave himself! If he says anything to you, honey, Joe tell him I

SATURDAY EVENING POST.

HENRY PETERSON, EDITOR.

PHILADELPHIA:

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1853.

ARE THE CONTENTS OF THIS POST ARE SET UP EXPRESSLY FOR IT, AND IT ALONE. IT IS NOT A MERE REPRINT OF A DAILY PAPER.

TERMS, &c.

The terms of the POST are $2 if paid in advance—$3, if not paid in advance. For $5 in advance, one copy is sent three years. We consider this City delivering less trouble to Clubs, to be sent in the city, to one address, and in the country, to one post-office:

4 Copies,	- - -	$5 00 Per Annum.
8 "	(and one to Agent, or the getter up of the Club,)	$10 00 "
12 "	(and one to Agent, or the getter up of the Club,)	$15 00 "
20 "	(and one to Agent, or the getter up of the Club,)	$25 00 "

Any person having sent the money and names for a Club, may add new names to it at the same rate, provided the latter will allow their subscription to end at the same time those of the earlier list do. We will willingly supply the back numbers if we have them. Our object is to have all the subscriptions to each Club end at one and the same time, and thus prevent confusion.

The Money for Clubs must always be sent in advance. When the sum is large, a draft should be procured if possible—the cost of which may be deducted from the amount.

Post Masters or others sending for Clubs, would confer a favor by having them send to one address when they can do so conveniently.

All persons wishing letters to us should be careful to give the name of the State, or mail as of the town, in which they live. All letters must be post-paid.

Subscribers wishing their papers changed, will please give the name of the Post Office to be changed from, as well as the Post Office they wish it hereafter sent to.

We trust our old friends, the Postmasters, will assist themselves and us by getting up Clubs for the NEWSPAPER POST. If they do not feel inclined to take advantage of our liberal offers themselves, feel they will show our prospectus to some other influential and responsible person who will be willing to do so. It must be remembered that the postage is just the same on a first class paper, as on the smallest and poorest of the small reprints.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

☞ The complimentary letters of "A Transcendent," Dr. P., of St. Johns, N. C., and others, have been very pleasant and cheering to us. We occasionally see articles going the rounds of the press, complimentary that readers of newspapers are very capricious, and hard to please. This, however, is not our experience. We do not think that we have received one letter of complaint, to a hundred of warm commendation, since we have been engaged in publishing the Post. This, we think, speaks well for both the Post and its readers—showing that the former has been worthy of general commendation, and that the latter are disposed to overlook trifling errors and defects in its management.

POETRY.—We are constantly in the receipt of poems, to the authors of which we can only say, those that pass muster will appear as we need them.

KOSSUTH.

We give in the present number a portrait of this illustrious champion of freedom. A concerted effort appears to have been made by the reactionary party of Europe, and those who sympathize with it, to dampen the ardor of the English and American people in behalf of the great Hungarian. Letter after letter—professedly from different individuals, but certainly of the same bearing marks of being from the same hand—have been published in the daily papers, in which a systematic attempt has been made to lessen the character and services of the renowned exile. But we have been pleased to find, that after all has been said, nothing has been really said against him.

Kossuth is accused of "behaving more like a conqueror than an exile." A singular trait this in the character of one the greatest and dignity of his character. He has a right to feel like a conqueror, for he has on his side all that is Godlike and Eternal. If he comported himself like a vanquished man, it would prove him less the hero and the leader. And, besides that, he knows that he is at this moment stronger in Hungary, in central Europe, even in Austria itself, than any monarch of them all. He is entrenched in millions of hearts, and on the page of history. He has achieved a deathless and immortal name; and why should he not feel and act like a conqueror? This is no new feeling on the part of an exile. Have not those paltry letter-writers read that

> "More true joy Marcellus, exiled, feels,
> Than Cæsar with a Senate at his heels!"

But no, those American bursers of incense at the shrine of European despotism, expected to find, and would have been pleased to find, in Kossuth, a broken-hearted man—their heads were full of Campbell's lines,

> "There came to the beach a poor exile of Erin,
> The dew on his thin robe was heavy and chill;"

and were surprised and alarmed at beholding a man, a hero, who would not own that the battle was yet lost, that the struggle was yet over; but who was preparing himself and his friends for a new onslaught upon all the powers of despotism, cruelty and darkness.

Therefore it is that a systematic attempt has been made by the Reactionists of Europe and their sympathizers, to decry Kossuth. If they did not fear him, would they be at so much trouble to prove him a nobody?

One letter-writer has the assurance to talk of America's making herself ridiculous in the eyes of Europe—meaning by Europe the lords and ladies, the wealthy and titled hoobies and noboddies, the givers of balls and parties. It is time this class of European society understood that we care not a feather for their gaudy opinion, that our hold is irreverence what they deem it, ridiculous, by virtue of our breeding and our want of it. That the time is coming when they will find that we have the right and power to set the fashion of what is, and what is not, honorable—and that, until that time comes, we can afford to conform to our own standard, and walk by our own light.

As for Kossuth, it remains not to be proved that he is a great man—we need not to see him, to know his height and his features, and the cut of his coat, to determine whether he is great or otherwise. His greatness is proven by the bold mark he has already made upon the page of history. Look at the records of his life. A poor lawyer at first, and the elected President of a gallant people at the last. A man of no external means of influence to begin with, and, in the course of a few years, the controlling spirit, the mental dictator of the Hungarian Diet and the Hungarian nation. What do you call mental greatness, if Kossuth's career be not a proof of it? What do you call moral greatness, if the nobility of the deeds of the Hungarian Diet, deeds originated and almost carried by him, be not a proof of it? Whence the outcrowdedness of the serfs, the conferring upon them of a large proportion of the land of the nation, and the other manifold sacrifices to the principles of Freedom by the Magyar race. If these things do not prove alike the nobleness of the Magyars and the nobleness of Kossuth, their leader in these movements, where can you find proofs of nobleness, of moral greatness, in the history of the world?

But then we are told that Kossuth wears a beard—in accordance with the custom of his people, and of almost all Europe, in some respects. Well, to answer a fool according to his folly, so did Adam, and the Jewish patriarchs, and King David, and the Saviour and His Apostles. It would be as much a mark of affectation for Kossuth to shave off his beard, as it is often for an American to wear one.

But then Kossuth was displeased with the officers of the Mississippi, without just cause. We are not so certain of that. When he entered an American vessel, he expected to meet men who were earnest lovers of constitutional liberty, like himself. It is very doubtful that he met much men. There is probably more aristocratic feeling on board of our ships of war, than the American people are at all conscious of. Not long since one of our national vessels received and saluted with all the honors, the most cruel despot in Europe, the bloody King of Naples. The San Jacinto which she was recently received with distinction on board one of the Mediterranean squadron. Now who could thus exchange courtesies with the executioner of Kossuth compeers, could have no real sympathy with Kossuth, or any earnest European liberal. Was it wonderful that Kossuth could not harmonize with them, or they with him? How could the prophet of freedom, Simpson-bound, but with a heart still full of its God-given fire, all alive and glowing for liberty, harmonize with a theocratical republican, a kid-glove and dainty believer in the rights of man. One who believeth perhaps in the flogging of those beneath him as the only means of keeping them in order—and therefore more disposed to fraternize with venue-whipping Haynes, or Minister of the Exam, than a man like Kossuth.

Another writer's standard of the best dress and other accessories of men of Kossuth's consequence, is more amusing than convincing. He does not remember that Americans are not Europeans, and that, therefore, generally dressed, they would not be recognized as men of mark and history without particular and peculiar badges. He forgets the company that once accompanied a certain Mr. George Washington, at Valley Forge—men who were opposed to gaudy ruffled shirt bosoms, the usual fashion. And, from the moment, since of Washington's death and to his last years, the dress of the citizens of the United States was that of Washington's men, with the exception of the use of the queue.

But, of all things, preserve us from Washington—from the men who define "Gentlemanly" to consist in "keeping a gig"—who see in a glance that a man is a "gentleman," or becomes he wears a high collar, and patent leather boots."

We cannot tell a great man by reading his glorious words of encouragement and undying hope, or by observing the effect produced by him upon the world; but these with till they can see what kind of clothing he puts on, and how he wears his beard! Moreover, who want to know first, how he is regarded by the titled simpletons and wealthy nonsites of the "first European circles."

That Kossuth is patient, we do not expect. That he has his coarse sensibilities that dim the glory of the internal radiance, is simply to say that he is a man. As Carlyle well expresses it:

> "Alas, the blind always love to grow in the Real, and to seek out its bad and hard bones, often in a very nasty way. He hasselblad Poet is a Bird of Paradise, living on pestilence; changing in the other with compound wings. The Herald, (Independence) of bad and hated, is found in Drury-Lane Theatre only; to avoid disappointments let us bear this in mind."

What a pity that these letter-writers had not borne this in mind—but, alas, poor fellows, they could not. They evidently have not the kind of mind that will bear the weight of noble and generous thoughts. "Responsibility" has crushed everything else—except a desire to find out the dark spots in every new sun of glory that floats before their vision. To say the best and prettiest of them, Greatness that is not in exile, Greatness that is acknowledged to be such by the "respectability," and has a title, and money in its pocket, is a blind, and the only blind, that they can appreciate. King David in his throne, they would allow to be a Great Man—the exiled David, hiding in his cave from the wrath of Saul; or pouring out the water as a sacrifice, which had been brought him at the peril of life; they would have thought a beggarly kind of a fellow, an exile, and a suspicious character.

And, speaking of King David, leads us to remark that there is much resemblance between the style of his psalms and greatness, and that of the gifted Hungarian. Kossuth, like David, is composed a fervid and powerful style—a style delivered by him on the occasion of the burial of a number of Hungarian soldiers, is full of the lyric splendor of David's psalms. And yet Kossuth, like David, is also eminently a practical man. That he is not a leader in war like the great captain of Israel, is a simple matter of education. That he would have distinguished himself in the field, as in the forum, if bred to arms, we have no doubt. Had that traitor Gorgey but obeyed his directions after the defeat of the Austrians, to march at once upon Vienna, the result of the contest might have been different.

One charge against Kossuth remains for us to mention—that is, that his conduct and speeches, during his stay on board the Mississippi, were unworthy of him, as calculated to identify him with the Socialists and Red Republicans, and to compromise the American Flag. We have not the time to go into a full discussion of these charges. But we must record our dissent emphatically from the last. It is laughable to find Kossuth blamed because the people of every port where the Mississippi stopped, gave vent to the most enthusiastic joy at his presence. And when the boats containing an excited populace flocked around the vessel, greeting with hurrahs the appearance of the most popular Liberal of Europe on board an American ship, the commander thought he should be compromising his flag, even by acknowledging their manifestations of joy by taking of his cap. Who can wonder that Kossuth should have thought such very careful propriety, unbefitting a naval representative of the great American Republic.

And because Kossuth's presence excited such demonstrations, in the greatest popular heart, the nobolition fiend, like some of old, and with about as much reason, that "a tomtit would be stirred up"—and so they politely requested Captain Long to leave. And the Captain, instead of laughing in his sleeve, and taking it as a compliment to his country, and his guest,—as it was—felt aggrieved, not at the authorities, but at Kossuth; felt that his vessel was being cleared out of every port into which she entered. Not only once, but being given, as he, or some one for him, writes, for him "to get his coals in." Truly sorrowful, was it not, for poor Captain Long to be treated thus shortly!

And Kossuth is found fault with—dear reader, we are not inventing this—for not staying down below, out of sight, when the vessel entered those European ports, and hundreds of boats began to flock around it. Why should he stay down below? Will might some of his friends complain, that they were as much prisoners as in Asia Minor. Stay below dark, for fear that even the presence of a free spirit might convulse to their fall the rotten governments of Southern Europe. Truly, a modest and consistent request for an American captain to make his illustrious guest!

As to the charge that Kossuth sympathizes with the Socialists or Red Republicans of Europe, we have no doubt he sympathizes with them more than with the Despots and Reactionists. We are no Socialist or Red Republican, but we would much rather be either, than follow the lead of Francis Joseph, or the King of Naples, or Czar Nicholas. We read that "oppression maketh even wise men mad;" and these European Socialists and Red Republicans have been maddened by the oppression of ages. Many a moderate Republican in America—yes, hundreds of thousands,—would be Red Republicans in Europe, and go for the oppressed righting themselves speedily, and by the "red right hand," if necessary. Cromwell was a Red Republican, when he declared that he would shoot Charles First, if they met in battle, as soon as any other man—and when he brought the head of that faithless and perfidious monarch to the block. We believe not in such hasty methods of righting wrong,—we go even to the extreme for peaceful methods of reform, believing that violence does even justice unjustly, and that peaceful reform is, in the long run, the speediest and surest; but we will not join in a cant of reprobation, originating in the ranks of European Reactionists, against men whose error is not one of treason to freedom and the highest interests of humanity; but, simply, one of judgment, originating in their peculiar position, as oppressed and long suffering men. As to their being sanguinary monsters, as some picture, let the white records of those short months when they bore rule in France and Rome, be compared with the records of the Reactionary Governments that succeeded them.

And thus, so far as we are concerned, we scatter to the winds those paltry charges against the great leader of Hungary, and say from our inmost soul—God bless Kossuth!

UTAH.

The last advices from Utah were to the effect that there had been a fare-up between the Mormon Governor, Brigham Young, and the other officers of the Territory who are not Mormons. The result was that the latter—Secretary of State, Judges, &c., &c.—were coming home as fast as their horses' legs could carry them. They charge Governor Young with having appropriated $20,000 of the public money to his own use, and, enjoying the spending of that, being on the scent of $30,000 more in the hands of the Secretary of State. Of course the complaint against, and the reply of the Mormon Governor, will be laid before the next session of Congress. When we hear both sides, we shall be able to judge whether the Saints have been spoiling to Egyptians or not. We have no great faith in the Mormons, but it is so much their interest to play fair with Uncle Sam, that we can hardly conceive of their being otherwise.

WOODEN SAILS.

Two Model Yachts with wooden sails are now to be seen in Goose Harbor, England. The yachts are about six feet long, and the sails are made of thin tin board, the thickness of veneer. A letter from Goose says: "It surprises every one to see how swiftly they cut along, and how close they sail to the wind with their wooden sails fat all, or go ahead when boomed out before the wind." The secret of the matter is, that the English boat builders are trying all manner of experiments in the hope of building something by skill or chance to beat the Yankees.

MR. THRASHER.

This gentleman, the American editor of a paper recently suppressed at Havana, has been arrested and is shortly to be tried on a charge of treason. One account says, that "the dungeon in which Mr. Thrasher is confined, is a wet hole, in which no man can survive a month." But the accounts are just about as contradictory as regards Mr. Thrasher, as they were respecting the Cuban invasion.

NEWSPAPER POSTAGE.

We have the next number of Congress but one year without a modification of the existing law in reference to the postage of newspapers. The present Administration of the general executive of the country, and the Congress, both, we believe, generally elected. The people of the thirty-one United States should be encouraged to take the large and well filled city journals instead of being discouraged. Congress, as many of those are, from the Southern and Western States, should be elected who should be elected from the country and villages of the States, and not from the cities. Let the people and history mature the question of postage of Public. He begets the company that once accompanied a certain Mr. George Washington, at Valley Forge—men who were opposed to gaudy ruffled shirt bosoms, the usual fashion. And, from the moment, since of Washington's death and to his last years, the dress of the citizens of the United States was that of Washington's men, with the exception of the use of the queue.

But, of all things, preserve us from Washington—from the men who define "Gentlemanly" to consist in "keeping a gig"—who see in a glance that a man is a "gentleman," or becomes he wears a high collar, and patent leather boots."

We cannot tell a great man by reading his glorious words of encouragement and undying hope, or by observing the effect produced by him upon the world; but these with till they can see what kind of clothing he puts on, and how he wears his beard! Moreover, who want to know first, how he is regarded by the titled simpletons and wealthy nonsites of the "first European circles."

That Kossuth is patient, we do not expect. That he has his coarse sensibilities that dim the glory of the internal radiance, is simply to say that he is a man. As Carlyle well expresses it:

> "Alas, the blind always love to grow in the Real, and to seek out its bad and hard bones, often in a very nasty way. He hasselblad Poet is a Bird of Paradise, living on pestilence; changing in the other with compound wings. The Herald, (Independence) of bad and hated, is found in Drury-Lane Theatre only; to avoid disappointments let us bear this in mind."

What a pity that these letter-writers had not borne this in mind—but, alas, poor fellows, they could not. They evidently have not the kind of mind that will bear the weight of noble and generous thoughts. "Responsibility" has crushed everything else—except a desire to find out the dark spots in every new sun of glory that floats before their vision. To say the best and prettiest of them, Greatness that is not in exile, Greatness that is acknowledged to be such by the "respectability," and has a title, and money in its pocket, is a blind, and the only blind, that they can appreciate. King David in his throne, they would allow to be a Great Man—the exiled David, hiding in his cave from the wrath of Saul; or pouring out the water as a sacrifice, which had been brought him at the peril of life; they would have thought a beggarly kind of a fellow, an exile, and a suspicious character.

And, speaking of King David, leads us to remark that there is much resemblance between the style of his psalms and greatness, and that of the gifted Hungarian. Kossuth, like David, is composed a fervid and powerful style—a style delivered by him on the occasion of the burial of a number of Hungarian soldiers, is full of the lyric splendor of David's psalms. And yet Kossuth, like David, is also eminently a practical man. That he is not a leader in war like the great captain of Israel, is a simple matter of education. That he would have distinguished himself in the field, as in the forum, if bred to arms, we have no doubt. Had that traitor Gorgey but obeyed his directions after the defeat of the Austrians, to march at once upon Vienna, the result of the contest might have been different.

One charge against Kossuth remains for us to mention—that is, that his conduct and speeches, during his stay on board the Mississippi, were unworthy of him, as calculated to identify him with the Socialists and Red Republicans, and to compromise the American Flag. We have not the time to go into a full discussion of these charges. But we must record our dissent emphatically from the last. It is laughable to find Kossuth blamed because the people of every port where the Mississippi stopped, gave vent to the most enthusiastic joy at his presence. And when the boats containing an excited populace flocked around the vessel, greeting with hurrahs the appearance of the most popular Liberal of Europe on board an American ship, the commander thought he should be compromising his flag, even by acknowledging their manifestations of joy by taking of his cap. Who can wonder that Kossuth should have thought such very careful propriety, unbefitting a naval representative of the great American Republic.

And because Kossuth's presence excited such demonstrations, in the greatest popular heart, the nobolition fiend, like some of old, and with about as much reason, that "a tomtit would be stirred up"—and so they politely requested Captain Long to leave. And the Captain, instead of laughing in his sleeve, and taking it as a compliment to his country, and his guest,—as it was—felt aggrieved, not at the authorities, but at Kossuth; felt that his vessel was being cleared out of every port into which she entered. Not only once, but being given, as he, or some one for him, writes, for him "to get his coals in." Truly sorrowful, was it not, for poor Captain Long to be treated thus shortly!

And Kossuth is found fault with—dear reader, we are not inventing this—for not staying down below, out of sight, when the vessel entered those European ports, and hundreds of boats began to flock around it. Why should he stay down below? Will might some of his friends complain, that they were as much prisoners as in Asia Minor. Stay below dark, for fear that even the presence of a free spirit might convulse to their fall the rotten governments of Southern Europe. Truly, a modest and consistent request for an American captain to make his illustrious guest!

As to the charge that Kossuth sympathizes with the Socialists or Red Republicans of Europe, we have no doubt he sympathizes with them more than with the Despots and Reactionists. We are no Socialist or Red Republican, but we would much rather be either, than follow the lead of Francis Joseph, or the King of Naples, or Czar Nicholas. We read that "oppression maketh even wise men mad;" and these European Socialists and Red Republicans have been maddened by the oppression of ages. Many a moderate Republican in America—yes, hundreds of thousands,—would be Red Republicans in Europe, and go for the oppressed righting themselves speedily, and by the "red right hand," if necessary. Cromwell was a Red Republican, when he declared that he would shoot Charles First, if they met in battle, as soon as any other man—and when he brought the head of that faithless and perfidious monarch to the block. We believe not in such hasty methods of righting wrong,—we go even to the extreme for peaceful methods of reform, believing that violence does even justice unjustly, and that peaceful reform is, in the long run, the speediest and surest; but we will not join in a cant of reprobation, originating in the ranks of European Reactionists, against men whose error is not one of treason to freedom and the highest interests of humanity; but, simply, one of judgment, originating in their peculiar position, as oppressed and long suffering men. As to their being sanguinary monsters, as some picture, let the white records of those short months when they bore rule in France and Rome, be compared with the records of the Reactionary Governments that succeeded them.

And thus, so far as we are concerned, we scatter to the winds those paltry charges against the great leader of Hungary, and say from our inmost soul—God bless Kossuth!

UTAH.

The last advices from Utah were to the effect that there had been a fare-up between the Mormon Governor, Brigham Young, and the other officers of the Territory who are not Mormons. The result was that the latter—Secretary of State, Judges, &c., &c.—were coming home as fast as their horses' legs could carry them. They charge Governor Young with having appropriated $20,000 of the public money to his own use, and, enjoying the spending of that, being on the scent of $30,000 more in the hands of the Secretary of State. Of course the complaint against, and the reply of the Mormon Governor, will be laid before the next session of Congress. When we hear both sides, we shall be able to judge whether the Saints have been spoiling to Egyptians or not. We have no great faith in the Mormons, but it is so much their interest to play fair with Uncle Sam, that we can hardly conceive of their being otherwise.

WOODEN SAILS.

Two Model Yachts with wooden sails are now to be seen in Goose Harbor, England. The yachts are about six feet long, and the sails are made of thin tin board, the thickness of veneer. A letter from Goose says: "It surprises every one to see how swiftly they cut along, and how close they sail to the wind with their wooden sails fat all, or go ahead when boomed out before the wind." The secret of the matter is, that the English boat builders are trying all manner of experiments in the hope of building something by skill or chance to beat the Yankees.

MR. THRASHER.

This gentleman, the American editor of a paper recently suppressed at Havana, has been arrested and is shortly to be tried on a charge of treason. One account says, that "the dungeon in which Mr. Thrasher is confined, is a wet hole, in which no man can survive a month." But the accounts are just about as contradictory as regards Mr. Thrasher, as they were respecting the Cuban invasion.

Messrs. California Shippers and Speculators:

Gentlemen—Since our respects of June 1st, 986,654 more of your elegantly selected and beautifully assorted invoices of merchandize have come to hand, and some of them have been sold at a slight loss of from twenty-five to fifty per cent.

The regular fire of the 14th of June, was postponed until the 25th, on account of the weather," and was then, by accident, arrested so early as to prevent our clearing out your entire lot of lawsons. Some articles which have advanced above cost and charges we have charged to our own account, and shall forward you account sales early in "the Spring." A few decorative articles, such as buckets and brooms—we have retained on your account, at the very low rate of $2 50 per ton per month. A regular fire is expected January 4th, and at farthest we expect to rejoice out the balance of your consignments by the anniversary fire of May 4th, and shall at our earliest convenience thereafter forward you final account sales, drawing on you at sight for the balance.

We are happy in being able to note a perfectly transparent state of our market—a delightful fascination in prices—and a "mighty uncertainty" in regard to payments.

We are glad to learn that money is in great demand with you, and beg to note for your particular gratification, the daily increasing alacrity of our genuine citizens' meeting fires. We contemplate making a small shipment of some two million dollars by each steamer for investment in fancy stocks.

Your clipper ships have been extremely fortunate in bringing only a few articles: but what would sell for enough to pay freight, which is a great improvement on the effects of your last season. Most of them have cleared for China, and will undoubtedly be able, either to load on your account with Exchange at from twenty to thirty per cent. discount, or take back to Europe or the States at two or three dollars per ton.

The balance of your vessels still lie here closely stowed together on the mud-flats in front of the city; and we would recommend their remaining where they now are, as it will save us the trouble and expense of filling up the bay with sand.

The news from the Mining Districts is very disheartening—the common laborers are actually becoming independent—and positively refuse to buy such articles as they do not want, or such as are of no earthly use. Many are so obstinate that they persist in living on fresh beef and game, instead of consuming the stock of pork and molasses. In many diggings there is not a supply of more than six pair of boots and shoes to each inhabitant, and, yet, strange as it may seem, you cannot force them to buy more, notwithstanding your patience and our system.

We would advise you to despatch immediately some five hundred more of your vessels with cargoes. Unless we have some fresh arrivals soon we fear that consumer's wages will decline. We forbear making suggestions with regard to future shipments, and will only say "go it while you are young."

Trusting this will fully satisfy you with regard to your prospects here, and indeed you to "discount,"

We beg to remain, gentlemen,
Your much obliged servants,
QUIZ & CO.

NEW MEXICO.

At the last advices there had been several murders of Americans by New Mexicans, great disagreement between the two races, and considerable excitement generally. Governor Calhoun was accused by the Americans of leaning too much towards the New Mexicans. It is difficult, from the telegraphic advices, to get at the bottom of the matter. A civil war was feared.

Our Portrait Gallery.

KOSSUTH.

The "London Times" thus describes the personal appearance of Kossuth. As the Times is no friend to the great Hungarian, of course the description is not in the least flattered:

"He stands about 5 feet 8 inches in height, has a slight and apparently not strongly-built frame, and is a little round-shouldered. His face is rather pale; a scar of which gray eyes, which somewhat reminded me of O'Connell's in expression, well set beneath a full and arched brow, gave an animated and intelligent look to his countenance. His cheek-bones high and bossed, is deeply wrinkled, and time has just begun to grizzle a head of straight dark hair, and to leave a bald spot behind. He has not yet the true Hungarian mien, but it is a fair well-formed feature, such as a French sculptor would describe as noble; a think manshe nearly covers his mouth, except when he smiles, when a full flash of dark hair falling down from his chin. Whether from his recent captivity or from constitutional habit, he walks with a full flush of dark hair falling down from his chin. Whether from his recent captivity or from constitutional habit, he walks with an air of indecision in his steps, in which the fatigues of his voyage not improbably contributed. Altogether he gives one the idea of a man of thought rather than of action, and there is a sensitive air in his face, mingled with a degree of melancholy, which would mark him for a visionary or theoretical enthusiast rather than for a great leader or a soldier."

RECEPTION IN ENGLAND.

The reception of Kossuth in England has been worthy the English nation and the man. His speech at Southampton showed the wonderful tact of the orator, being precisely adapted to the English mind—clear, practical and marked by strong common sense. It had already produced the wonderful revulsion of feeling—the conservatives being completely won by it. That Kossuth is not a fanatic in Republicanism, the following passage proves:

> M Kossuth begged to take the opportunity of again thanking his English and American friends for their cordial sympathy on behalf of his unhappy country. He came, he said, to England upon her ancient and liberal institutions, and not upon her more well-ascertained independence and constitutional republicanism. The same was nothing; it was the glory of the institutions and the spirit of the people which gave them their true value. There were differences of position, of history, and of internal government, which rendered one kind of institution acceptable to one people, and another form of government to another, but the spirit of all was the same, if the people were to be free; and that was the principle which he (Kossuth) claimed as the right of the people, whether in England and the United States, was independence in freedom, social order, and the welfare of the people. (Loud cheers.) As regarded his own individual interests, he had already had in the generous sympathies of the free people of that country. If they could only insure the acknowledgment of the sovereign right of every people to dispose of themselves and their destinies, the independence of Hungary would be secured.

A letter from a "distinguished American" to the New York Times, says that it was Kossuth's intention to remain in England ten days, and come to the United States in one of the steamships. The following is an extract from the letter:

> London, Friday, Oct. 24, 1851.
>
> . . . Kossuth has not erred. He's admirable disclosures at Southampton, which is in the Times of this morning, has produced to-day an immense sensation. . . . There may be some feeling in America on account of Kossuth coming first to Southampton; but long before the Mississippi was sent, he had made arrangements for getting his children to school here, Mr. Cobden having kindly offered to take charge of his daughter. It was to settle his wife and children as to had all along proposed to do, that he decided to touch at Southampton, and one would suppose that the public feeling of the United States would censure either the Captain, who refused to bring him here and wait three days for him, or Secretary of the Navy, if this act were caused by the stringent instructions to the Captain. Mr. Secretary Walker, who is here, thanks the Captain much, declaring that England, by her efforts, had done enough, (apart from considerations of his family,) to justify Kossuth in stopping here a few days on his way to America. He proposes now to remain ten days, and then take one of the packet steamers.

It shows the good sense of Kossuth, that in England, he has declined all partizan demonstrations of respect, on the broad principle of doing nothing which would be construed by malevolence into an unseemly interference in the domestic concerns of a country not his own, and which had generously afforded him protection and hospitality.

IRON RAIL CAR.

An iron railroad car has recently been constructed in New York, which feels fair, it is thought, to take the place of the wooden ones. Its advantages are said to be these: its great cheapness and its lightness as compared to the cost and weight of the wooden car; the great saving in the wearing-out of the rail, consequent upon its extreme lightness; its durability, "never wearing out," so to speak; and the superior safety and security it affords. A correspondent of the Boston Post says:

> It is not easy to conceive how one of those "wrought iron cars," if thrown from a track, would be broken to pieces, nor how it could be destroyed entirely by collision of trains. Some portions of the car might be, but those pieces could be immediately replaced by others; whereas, if a wood car is damaged even if it is a total ruin. Besides, there are no splinters to be thrown in crushing this car, by which so many lives are lost and limbs maimed. The concussion, too, in any event, would not be so dead a stroke, for iron has an elasticity which does not belong to wood, when put into sublimt form. Moreover, it is alleged that the superior lightness and elasticity of this car would admit of carrying a vastly greater number of passengers on the same wheels, and with less propelling power. It is said, too, that the elliptical spring chair is to be applied not only to the body of the car, but to the seats of the passengers, thus securing greater comfort to travellers, and in the event of a collision, these springs would yield and give, so that the jolt, the jar, the shock would not be so severely felt.

So far, so good—but the disadvantages of a new thing are not often known till it is tried—We remember the iron boats, a few years ago, were to supersede all others—and now it is questioned whether they will do to use at all.

THE IRISH EXILES.

An effort is now being made in this city, which is warmly supported by almost all our prominent politicians of both political parties, to induce the President of the United States to interpose the friendly offices of our Government, for the purpose of obtaining, as a matter of humanity, from the Government of Great Britain, the release of William Smith O'Brien and his associates now exiled as convicts in Australia. As Great Britain interposed with Turkey in aid of Kossuth, the contemplated interposition by the United States would be following somewhat "in the footsteps of our illustrious predecessor." Of course the movement is to be entirely friendly and courteous—in fact, any other would defeat its own aim.

GONE HOME.

The Rev. Father Mathew left New York on Saturday last for his home in Ireland, by the Collins Steamship Pacific. A large concourse of people assembled at the wharf and cheered him as he passed on board the vessel. May prosperous gales attend him on his passage.

ARRIVED.

The U. S. Steam Frigate Mississippi arrived at New York on the 10th, in 26 days from Gibraltar, having on board forty-two (including children) of the refugees who left Turkey with Kossuth. The Mississippi was received with salutes from the forts and men of war in port.

PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD.

Our readers will perceive by an advertisement on the third page, that the time will be reduced after December 1st, between this city and Pittsburg, to twenty-four hours. Those will thus be only twenty-eight miles of staging, over an excellent turnpike.

REV. J. LORD'S LECTURES.

Mr. Lord, who lectured so acceptably in this city last Winter, has commenced a new course upon the Heroes of the Reformation. He will deliver six lectures—upon Gustavus Adolphus, and the Thirty Years' War; John Calvin, and Primitive Christianity; Henry IV., or, France and the Huguenots; Thomas Cranmer, and the English Church; Oliver Cromwell and the Puritans; and George Fox and his Society. These Lectures are intended to show the different aspects and developments of Protestantism in different countries, and bid fair to be of great interest.—They will be delivered at the Hall of the University.

Foreign Items.

Kossuth had arrived at Southampton, where his reception was most affecting and enthusiastic; as it was, indeed, by the whole population. He proceeded with the Mayor to his office in a carriage, the carriage being decorated with the Hungarian, American and English colors entwined. Here he was presented with an address, made a speech from the balcony, which was greeted with deafening cheers. Madame Kossuth was also introduced, and received with great enthusiasm, as were also their children.

At four o'clock, accompanied by the Mayor, the American Consul, and many gentlemen of distinction, he proceeded to the Town Hall, where he was formally introduced to the members of the corporation and citizens. Addresses on the part of the corporation and citizens of Southampton were presented to him, to which he replied with much feeling and appropriateness.

The Hungarian flag wrought at New York, was then presented to Kossuth, by Mr. Crosbey, the American Consul; and receiving it, he said with much apparent emotion—"I receive it, gentlemen, as a most valuable gift entrusted by you to the people of Hungary, and I swear by it to do whatever may be my fate. Conscience or ambition shall never tarnish this flag."

He spend the night at the house of the Mayor, and the next morning proceeded to the Mayor's private residence, at Winchester. The people of the villages on the road turned out in immense crowds to see and welcome him, and at every point he was received with the most enthusiastic cheers. He would stay a few days at Winchester. On Tuesday, he made a private visit to London, (in a foreign port of the day's patch, it is stated to be Monday,) but returned the next day to attend the banquet to be given him at Southampton, and at which the Hon. Abbott Lawrence, Ex-Secretary Walker and others, were expected to be present.

An interesting incident occurred at the Mayor's residence on Friday. Two caskets of jewels belonging to Madame Kossuth had been lost during the insurrectionary war in Hungary, and were given up at last. It seemed, however, that somebody or other had already recovered to Madame Pulszky, who on Friday had the gratification of restoring them to their right owner. The jewels it is said, are worth from 3,000 to £4,000.

A deputation of a committee of workingmen had invited Kossuth to a banquet in London, which, however he had declined, on account of his short stay in the country. He had many suggestions to make, and wished to meet and speak with all classes, giving cause of offence to none by seeming partiality.

A story is current in regard to the threat of Austria to break off intercourse, but Lord Palmerston had assured Lord Dudley Stuart that he would give Kossuth an official interview.

The Address of the Corporation of London was to be presented to Kossuth, at Guild Hall, on Thursday, the 30th.

All further search for Sir John Franklin appears to have been given up for the present.

At a Council held by the Queen, on the 24th, Parliament was ordered to be further prorogued from the 4th of November to the 25th of January.

Mr. George Peabody, of London, had given a splendid entertainment to the American exhibitors. Lord Granville, Sir Henry Bulwer, Hon. Abbot Lawrence, and numerous other distinguished persons were present. Mr. Bulwer delivered a speech highly complimentary to America, which was received by the company present, with the utmost enthusiasm.

The Duchess of Angoulême, daughter of Louis XVI., died on the 19th of October, leaving two millions of franks to her nephew, the Comte de Chambord.

The Royal Commissioners have voted £5,000 to Mr. Paxton, the designer of the Crystal Palace. Messrs. Paxton, Fox and Cubitt have been knighted by the Queen.

A new History of Bonapartist tendencies has been appointed by Louis Napoleon. The gentleman forming the new Ministry are considered to present as good a guarantee for the maintenance of good order, as the preceding cabinet. The Bourse was scarcely affected by the change, whilst quiet reigns in Paris.

The accounts from the Departments are for from tranquillizing.

A manifesto from the Prince de Joinville, putting forth his claims for the Presidency, is immediately expected. Also, one from General Changarnier is looked for.

The stories of the discovery of gold in abundance in Lower California, are said to be void of truth.

☞ A Mr. Dorr, giving evidence to character in the case of a woman charged with theft, said she was "a decent, honest, drunken creature."

☞ We read in a Madrid letter of the 20th ultimo:—"Yesterday, as Queen Isabella was passing through the street of the arsenal, she met a procession proceeding with the Host to the house of a sick person. She immediately alighted, and hastened upon the priest entering her carriage. She followed on foot; and, notwithstanding her advanced state of pregnancy, accended the stairs with the priest to the bedside of the dying patient."

☞ To BE INVITED.—Among the things that are wanted by everybody is a substitute for pen and ink. It seems that a single instrument ought to perform the function, and that fluid ink may be dispensed with. Cannot some substance be found, simple or compound, that will make an indelible mark upon paper, being hard enough also to hold a fine point? Or cannot paper be so prepared, without great addition of expense, as to aid the purpose?—Scientific American.

We take the following interesting and amusing items from the Trade correspondence of the Ledger:—

It is stated by those who pretend to know something of the matter, that Queen Adelaide, widow of William IV., has in her private coffers the enormous sum of £700,000 sterling, which is left entirely at her own disposal. The Queen Dowager is also entitled to a handsome annuity from the civil list.

The French papers state that the Duchess of Orleans, mother of the Count de Paris, and Duke de Nemours, is so afflicted with a cancer in the breast, that the surgeons have declared it to be useless to attempt to relieve her sufferings.

Prince Metternich, who has been one of the most powerful men in Europe, has been compelled by age and infirmities to resign his office of Chancellor of State, which has been conferred upon Count Buol Schauenstein.

Mr. Lyon Playfair, the scientific friend of the late Sir Robert Peel, has been appointed Chemist to the Queen's Household.

Mr. Disraeli, the leader of the Conservative party in the House of Commons, has been elected Lord Rector of the University of Glasgow, by a majority of 657 votes over Mr. Gladstone, the late Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Wm. Howitt, Editor and Proprietor of the Critic, writes:

Sir—Within the last two months your Journal has published two articles in relation to me.—The first does not mention me by name, but the tenor of the latter leaves no room to doubt that it is I of whom you speak; and to all your self of the responsibility, you profess to have received your article from a well-known Journal. English writers, sir, are not in fashion.

The second article (a Belgian forgery) bears my name, and gives me the right to compel you to assent to your Journal my reply to your gratuitous attack. I, however, do not desire to avail myself of this right, and, whilst I am not aware of having done anything to merit.

1. I do not understand so to sing, sir; but had I the desire to learn, you might well be my teacher, sir, for you are a perfect (in French music as well, sir) brute to the mind.)

2nd. My correspondence with certain high personages is "quite worth your coin, forgiveness! (Rushed to admiration by the Critic.)

3rd. As to pelagarella and pistols, I do not understand their use, but your learned zeal makes me aware of their existence, of which one will be poisoned and the other not."

I

SATURDAY EVENING POST.

PHILADELPHIA:

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 1851.

SATURDAY EVENING POST

STEAM-POWER BOOK AND JOB PRINTING OFFICE,

No. 66 South Third Street, Phila.,

Where Books, Pamphlets, Mss., Bills, Way Bills, Circulars, Bill Heads, Cards, Labels, &c., &c., are printed with dispatch, in the neatest manner, and on the most reasonable terms.

DEACON & PETERSON, Proprietors.

DESTRUCTION OF A WHALE-SHIP BY A SPERM WHALE.

Sinking of the Ship—Loss of Two Boats and Miraculous Escape of the Crew.

The "Panama Herald" of Oct. 16th, gives the following singular account of the destruction of a ship and two boats by a whale. A similar event is said to have occurred about twenty years ago, when the ship Essex, Captain Arthur, was destroyed by a whale. In that case, while some of the crew, in boats, were engaged in an encounter with a whale, another whale rushed to the ship and struck her three violent blows amidships. The third blow was effectual and completely destructive. The ship was abandoned, and the crew landed on an uninhabited island in the South Pacific, where they were reduced, by threatened starvation, to the dreadful alternative of sacrificing one of their lives for the preservation of the rest.

This shows that while it may be a very pleasant thing to beat whales, it is not so pleasant if they turn about and beat you—though turn about is fair play:

We have just received the following thrilling account of the destruction of the whale-ship Ann Alexander, Captain John S Dobbin, of New Bedford, by a large sperm whale, from the lips of the Captain himself, who arrived in this city from Payta, on Sunday last, in the schooner Providence. A similar circumstance has never been known to occur; but once in the whole history of whale fishing, and that was the destruction of the ship Essex, some twenty or twenty-five years ago, by a whale, the particulars of which we fully remember. We proceed to the narrative as furnished us by Capt. Dobbin, and which is fully authenticated by nine of the crew in a protest under the seal of the U. S. Consul, Alexander Aspinwall, at Paita.

The ship Ann Alexander, Capt. S. Dobbin, sailed from New Bedford, May, 1850, for a cruise in the South Pacific, for sperm whale. Having taken about 500 barrels of oil in the Atlantic, the ship proceeded on her voyage to the Pacific. Nothing of material interest occurred until when passing Cape Horn, one of the men, named Jackson Walker, of Newport, N. H., was lost overboard in a storm. Reaching the Pacific, we came to the coast and stopped at Valdivia, Coast of Chili, for fresh provisions, and on the 31st of March last, she called at Paita, for the purpose of shipping a man. The vessel proceeded on her voyage to the South Pacific.

On the 20th of August last, she reached what is well known to all whalers as the Off Shore Ground, in lat. 5 deg. 30 min. South, lon. 102 deg West. In the forenoon of the day, about 9 o'clock, whales were discovered in the neighborhood, and about noon, the same day, they succeeded in making fast to one. Two boats were gone after the whales—the larboard and starboard—the former commanded by the first mate, and the latter by Captain Dobbin. The whale which they had struck, was encountered by the larboard boat. After running some time, the whale turned upon the boat, and rushing at it with tremendous violence, lifted upon its enormous jaws, and taking the boat in its mouth, crushed it into fragments as small as a common-sized chair! Capt. Dobbin immediately pulled for the scene of the disaster with the starboard boat, and succeeded, against all expectations, in rescuing the whole of the crew of the boat—nine in number!

There were now eighteen men in the starboard boat, consisting of the captain, the first mate, and the crews of both boats. The frightful disaster had been witnessed from the ship, and the weather, which had late rendered it impossible to lower, relaxed. The distance from the ship was about six miles. As soon as the waist-boat arrived, the crews were divided, and it was determined to remain by the ship, and thus be ready to resume the attack upon him. Accordingly they separated, and proceeded at some distance from each other, as it is usual on such occasions, for the whale. In a short time they came up to him, and prepared to give him battle. The waist-boat, commanded by the first mate, was in advance. As soon as the whale saw them, a most demoniac action being made upon him, he turned his course, suddenly, and making a tremendous dash at this boat, seized it with his wide-spread jaws, and crushed it into splinters, although the men were time to escape his vengeance, by throwing themselves into the ocean.

Capt. Dobbin, again seeing the perilous condition of his men, at the risk of meeting the same fate, directed his boat to hasten to their rescue, and in a short time succeeded in saving them all from a watery grave. How horrible must that feeling which they had taken as assuredly escaped. He then ordered the boat to put for the ship as speedily as possible; and no sooner had the order been given than they discovered the monster of the deep making toward them with his jaws widely extended. Fortunately the monster came up and passed them at a short distance. The boat then made her way to the ship and they all got on board in safety.

After reaching the ship, a boat was first pitched for the use of the demolished boats, and it was determined to pursue the whale with all speed. As soon as the boat returned with the oars, sail was set, and the ship proceeded after the whale. In a short time she overtook him, and a lance was thrown into his head. The ship passed on by him, and immediately after they discovered that the whale was making for the ship. At he came up near her, they hauled to the wind, in order to get the monster to pass her. After he had fairly passed they kept off to overtake and attack him again. When the ship had reached within about fifty rods of him, they discovered that the whale had settled down deep below the surface of the water, and as it was near sundown, they concluded to give up the pursuit.

Capt. Dobbin was at this time standing in the night-hands on the larboard bow, with craft in hand, ready to strike the monster a deadly blow should he appear, the ship was going about 8 knots; when working on the side of the ship, he discovered the whale making towards her at the rate of fifteen knots! In an instant, the monster struck the ship with his tremendous head, and knocked her from stem to stern! She quivered under the violence of the shock, as if she had struck upon a rock! Capt. Dobbin immediately descended into the forecastle, and to his horror, discovered that the monster had struck the ship about two feet from the keel, abreast the forehead, knocking a great hole entirely through her bottom, through which the water poured, and rushed impetuously! Springing to the deck, he ordered the mate to cut away the anchors and get the boats over-board, to bring the ship before the wind, as she had a large quantity of pig iron on board. In doing this the mate succeeded in relieving only one anchor and cable clear, the other having been fastened around the foremast. The ship was then sinking rapidly. The captain went in the cabin, where he found three feet of water; he, however, succeeded in procuring a chronometer, sextant and chart. Reaching the decks, he ordered the boats to be cleared away, and to get water and provisions, as the ship was fast leaving ever. He again descended to the cabin, but the water was rushing in so rapidly, that he could procure nothing. He came upon deck, ordered all hands into the boats, and then left himself to leave the ship, which he did by throwing himself into the sea and swimming to the nearest boat! The ship was on her beam-ends, her topgallant yards under water. They then pushed off some distance from the ship, expecting her to sink in a very short time. Upon an examination of the stores they had been able to save, he discovered that they had only twelve quarts of water, and not a mouthful of provisions of any kind! The boats contained eleven men each, were leaky, and night coming on; they were obliged to bail them all night to keep them from sinking!

Next day, at daylight, they returned to the ship, no one daring to venture on board but the captain, their intention being to cut away the mast, and fearful that the moment the masts were cut away the ship would go down. With a single hatchet, the captain went on board, and cut away the mast, when the ship righted. The boats then came up, and the men, by the sole aid of spades, cut away the main cabin floor and part of the forecastle, which got the ship nearly on her keel. The men then tied ropes round their bodies, got into the sea, and on a whole through the decks to get out provisions. They could procure nothing but about five gallons of vinegar and twenty pounds of wet bread. The ship threatened to sink, and they deemed it imprudent to remain by her longer, as they set sail in their boats and left her.

On the 23rd of August, at about five o'clock P. M., they had the indescribable joy of discovering a ship in the distance. They made signal, and were soon answered, and in a short time they were reached by the good ship Nantucket, of Nantucket, Mass., Capt. Gibbs, who took them all on board, clothed and fed them, and attended to them in every way the greatest possible hospitality.

On the succeeding day, Capt. Gibbs went to the wreck of the ill-fated Ann Alexander, for the purpose of trying to procure something from her, but as the sea was rough, and the attempt considered dangerous, he abandoned the project. The Nantucket then set sail for Paita, where she arrived on the 16th of September, and where she landed Captain Dobbin and his men. Captain Dobbin was kindly and hospitably received and entertained at Paita, by Captain Bathurst, an English gentleman residing there, and subsequently took passage on board the merchant vessel Providence, Captain Gifford, for this port, arriving here on Sunday last, the 12th instant.

At Paita, Captain Dobbin entered his protest at the U. S. Consulate, which was authenticated by the following officers and seamen, on board at the time of the disaster; the two officers and the rest of the crew having since arrived on board other vessels: Joseph E. Green, first mate; James Smith, third do; John Morgan, carpenter; James Riley, cooper; James McRoberts, John Smith, William Hall, Henry Reid, and Charles F. Booth, seamen.

☞ English speculators are making money in London by engaging females to wear the Bloomer costume, and deliver lectures and addresses upon it. They call themselves "Amerizons!"

General News.

THE MAINE LIQUOR LAW.

As considerable curiosity has been felt respecting this very stringent anti-liquor law, we give the following abstract of its principal provisions, for which we are indebted to a Boston paper:

Sect. 1. Prohibits any manufacturer person from selling spirituous and intoxicating liquors of any kind.

Sect. 2. Authorizes the appointment of such agents to appoint an agent, to reside in the most central and convenient portion of the town, with authority to sell liquors, for medical purposes and for the arts; who is to hold his office one year, unless removed.

Sect. 3. Provides for a certificate to be given by the agent, evidence of his authority, and given the form, &c., of his bonds.

Sect. 4. Provides that any person selling by himself, his clerk, or agent, shall be fined, for the first offence, ten dollars and costs; for the second, twenty dollars and costs; and in case a third committed 100 paid; and for every subsequent offence, twenty dollars and costs, and be imprisoned three to six months.

Sect. 5. Provides the mode of prosecution, and designates that the penalties shall go for the support of the poor.

Sect. 6. Provides that bonds shall be given in cases of appeal, for the prosecution of the appeal, and the payment of all fines and costs.

Sect. 7. Provides for the appointment of persons who may manufacture fabricating liquors to be used for medicinal purposes, and in the arts.

Sect. 8. Provides for a penalty of one hundred dollars, and in default thereof, imprisonment for sixty days, for the first offence; and for double the penalty for every subsequent offence, in cases where persons undertake to manufacture without such legal appointment.

Sect. 9. Provides that all persons engaged in the unlawful traffic shall be competent to sit on a jury.

Sect. 10. Provides that cases arising under the act shall take precedence in all Courts of justice except in certain criminal cases named.

Sect. 11. Provides that any three persons being voters, on making oath to that to their belief liquors are unlawfully stored or kept for sale in any given place, the justice before whom such oath is made, shall issue his warrant for the seizure of the same, and if found, it is, after the proper inquiry, to be destroyed. If the owner sets up a claim that the said liquors are imported, and that duties have been paid on them to the Government, he may reserve, if he can prove that they are so imported; but neither the certificate of importation, nor the Custom House marks on the casks are to be taken in evidence.

Sect. 12. Provides some safeguards against destroying liquors seized, until properly advertised, in the town where the owner may not be known.

Sect. 13. Makes provisions for appeals in certain cases.

Sect. 14. Provides that if any liquors are found at public trainings or other gatherings, the person owning or selling the same, shall be imprisoned for thirty days, and the liquor destroyed.

Sect. 15. Makes provision for sureties in case of appeals.

Sect. 16. Makes all payments for liquors; all notes given for liquors; all mortgages, &c., given to secure liquor debts, &c., &c., unlawful, null and void.

FARE-SHARERS.—A law was passed during the last session of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, which is highly important to partnership firms, and is, in all probability but comparatively little known. The sections are to be found on page 52 of the Pamphlet Laws of 1851, and the provisions are as follows:

Sec. 15. That from and after the tenth of August next, all persons engaged in any trade or business in a partnership capacity in this commonwealth, shall file or cause to be filed in the office of the Prothonotary, in the county or counties where such partnership is carried on, the name or style and location of such partnership, with the style and name of the same; and as often as any change of members in said partnership shall take place, the same shall be certified by the members of such new partnership as aforesaid; and in default or neglect of such partnership so to do, they shall not be permitted in any suits or actions against them, in any Court or before any Justice of the Peace or Alderman in this Commonwealth to plead any misnomer or the omission of the name of any member of the partnership or the inclusion of the name of persons not members of said partnership.

Sec. 16. That thereafter, when two or more persons may be desirous of entering into any business whatever in partnership capacity, they shall, before they engage or enter into any such business as aforesaid, comply with, and be subject to all the provisions and restrictions in the next preceding section of this act.

RUNNERS! ATTENTION ARUSED.—An old man of respectable appearance went up to a fingerand-de-Ville, in the Rue de Cluny, and requested to be taken in custody, as he had killed his best friend. The officer looked at the simply as a strange a request, whereupon the old gentleman showed him his hands, stained with blood, and requesting him to accompany him to his lodgings, where he said he would show him the corpse.

On entering the apartment of the old man, the officer found the body of a large Newfoundland dog lying in a pool of blood; and the man related, with every sigh of the most violent description, how he tried to draw a knife into the side of the animal had bit him, and he, in his fury, had stabbed him.

"You see," he continued, "that I am a murderer, and worth the scaffold. Give me up to justice!"

The concierge, coming up, informed the officer that the old gentleman, who is a retired captain, was not owned in his mind; and accordingly he was taken at once to an asylum.—French Paper.

SECURITY AGAINST BANK NOTE FRAUDS.—James Atwater, Esq., of this city, has taken measures to secure a patent for preventing the alteration of Bank Notes from a lower to a higher denomination. His plan is a very simple one, and the wonder is that it had not been thought of before. Besides the figures to indicate the value of the note, he has borders on the end—a single border for a one dollar bill—two borders for two dollars—and five for five dollars. These are at the left hand of the bill. For a ten dollar note, there is a single border on the right hand of the bill—two borders for a twenty dollar note —and so on. They are further distinguished by borders on the ends. These borders change the position of the names of the President and Cashier, and also of other parts of the bill—so that the general appearance of each denomination is entirely different from every other —although the pictures, figures, and writings may be precisely the same. The invention strikes us as a very important one, and we should think it would come into general use.—New Haven Palladium.

CURIOUS FACT.—There is a venerable citizen now living in the neighborhood of Cincinnati, who, being in his eighty-sixth year, can remember the signing of the Declaration of Independence. He has voted at every Presidential election since the organization of the Government. The Commercial says:

"He descended the Ohio River, and passed the point where Cincinnati now stands before a single tree had been felled upon the spot, and before even a thought of our present power had entered into the dreamy phantasies of prophetic speculation. Think of it! One new among so —one among two hundred thousand in the busy throng of business—one who stood upon the ground where we now live before Cincinnati was born! We can scarcely realize it; but yet it is so. The onward march of unceasing civilization has worked wonders in this great country of ours. This old man can yet see to read without glasses, and is possessed of the vigor of middle life."

IMPROVEMENT OF THE NAVIGATION OF THE UPPER MISSISSIPPI.—The Convention which assembled in Burlington, Iowa, on the 23rd ult., for the purpose of considering the project of removing the obstruction to the navigation of the Upper Mississippi, occasioned by the Rapids, was the largest, most intelligent, and enthusiastic one, that has ever been held in any of the mighty West. Four States (Iowa, Missouri, Illinois, Wisconsin,) and the Territory of Minnesota, were fully and creditably represented. The greatest unanimity prevailed, and, from the happy union of sentiment and purpose within the Convention, and promises of support from distinguished men without, there is every prospect that this great and indispensable internal improvement will be effected.

IMPORTANT TO IOWA.—It appears by the Union, that the Secretary of the Interior has decided in favor of the claim of Iowa to the Congressional grant of lands above the "Raccoon Fork" of the Des Moines River, instead of limiting it from the mouth to that point, and has ordered Sale of 200 tracts to be made out for his approval. The decision confirms the action had upon the subject by Mr. Secretary Walker, and reverses the subsequent and contrary decision of Mr. Secretary Ewing.

JAVA COFFEE RAISED IN CHAMBERS COUNTY ALABAMA.—We were shown recently a parcel of Java coffee, fully matured, that grew in the midst of the shrubbery that decorates Dr. John T. Garland's yard, about a mile from this town. It looked as natural as the imported article. The shrub that produced this coffee is but two years old, and bears prolifically. The tree operated from a grain of coffee, which was planted on the North side of the house.—Mobile (N. C.) Chronicle.

HORRIBLE.—The last Warrenton (North Carolina) News states that a negro child, belonging to Mr. Travis Talley, near Roanoke, was devoured last week by hogs. The child was lying in a house on the floor, the mother having stepped out, when some hogs entered, and before the mother returned, had eaten it up.

POLITICAL NEWS.

VIRGINIA.—The new Constitution of Virginia will, it is estimated, be adopted by a vote reaching a majority of from 40,000 to 50,000.

NEW YORK.—The vote in every close city; the prohibitionists are, at the time of writing this, that the whole Whig State ticket is elected; with the exception possibly of the State Engineer. The indications also are that the Whigs will have a majority in both branches of the Legislature.

MASSACHUSETTS.—Gen. Foote has been elected Governor, on (so it is thought) three Union Congressmen. There will be a Union majority in the House of Representatives. The Senate is close and the result doubtful.

MARYLAND.—The Baltimore Democratic State ticket is elected—Comptroller, Lottery-Commissioner, and Commissioner of the Land Office—by from 2,000 to 3,000 majority. The Senate will stand 12 Whigs to 10 Democrats, if the latest reports are correct, as they are believed to be. The Democrats will have two majority in the House of Delegates.

THE FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.—We learn from the Vincennes (Indiana) Gazette, that Judge Dunlap, of Illinois, in the case of a negro recently arrested and brought before him on a fugitive slave on a writ of habeas corpus, doubted that the law for recovering slave property was unconstitutional, and therefore discharged the supposed runaway.

INDIANA.—The Democrats are successful by large majorities. The indications are, that the Free Banking Law has been adopted by a majority of over 10 000.

WISCONSIN.—There is little doubt of the election of Farwell, (Whig,) for Governor, by from 1,000 to 2,000 majority. The Whigs and Free Soilers have, probably, also a majority in the Assembly.

MISSOURI.—The Democrats have elected their Governor by over 10,000 majority.

THE CUBA EXPEDITION.—The charge of Judge McLean to the Grand Jury of the U. S. Circuit Court for Ohio, at the late October Term, related entirely to the compelling against Cuba, of which the learned Judge says: "There never was an invasion among civilized nations more atrocious and less excusable."

NEW JERSEY ELECTION.—There will be a joint-ballot Democratic majority in the next session of the New Jersey Legislature of 34. The majority in six in the Senate and twenty-eight in the Assembly.

QUEEN CONSIDERATE.—The new Constitution of Virginia contains in the 3rd article the following clause: "And no person shall have a right to vote who is of unsound mind, or a pauper, or a non-commissioned officer in the service of the United States.

THE BLACK LAW.—The law prohibiting negroes and mulattoes from coming in and residing in Oregon, has been decided to be constitutional and valid by the Supreme Court of that State. The negro, in a case brought before him recently. The defendant (colored) was directed to leave the territory within thirty days from the date of the decree.

THE BOSTON RESCUE CASE.—Morris, one of the persons alleged to have been implicated in the rescue of the slave Shadrach, on the 15th of February last, was put upon trial in the United States Circuit Court, at Boston, on Monday week. In impanelling the jury, the prosecuting Attorney propounded, among others, the following interrogatories:—

Have you formed an opinion that the law of the United States, known as the Fugitive Slave Law of 1850, is unconstitutional, so that you cannot convict a person indicted under it for that reason, if the facts alleged in the indictment be proved, and the Court hold the statute to be constitutional?

Do you hold any opinions upon the subject of the Fugitive Slave Law, so called, which will induce you to refuse to convict a person indicted under it, if the facts set forth in the indictment and considered proved, and the Court instruct you that the law is constitutional?

Six jurors were set aside, because they had formed opinions adverse to the Fugitive Slave Law.

OHIO.—The Ohio State vote was polled on official returns of the election of most of the counties, and states that Wood's (Dem.) majority for Governor will be between 20 000 and 30,000. The Free Soil candidate for Governor, (Lewis,) receives in the State about 16,000 votes. The Free Soilers elect nothing except one Senator and two Representatives.

MR. BENTON.—"Old Bullion" recently expressed himself as follows, in a letter to Mr. Blair, of St. Louis, respecting a proposition for a united Convention between the Buntonites and the Anti-Bentonites:

"I answer instantly and truly, that I would rather die in cornell with the six thousand dead who died of cholera in St. Louis, than to go into convention with such a gang of scamps, and that is my sentiment to-day. The point is to defeat them. Two public inquiries I shall not make—the strength when they are gone, and, what is more, we shall be clear."

A BANK CASE.—The Washington Republic contains a report of the following case, involving the usages of banks:

Circuit Court.—James Adams (cashier of the Bank of Washington,) vs. Philip Otterback. This was an action on a note drawn by Haw, Talbott & Company, dated 1st May, 1837, payable to the order of the defendant at sixty days, and by him endorsed, and which had been discounted by the Bank of Washington at the defendant's request, with the proceeds of such discount paid on his check.

It was shown that the usage of the Bank on all discounted notes, in demand payment, and give notice, in case of non-payment, to each endorser, on the fourth day instead of the third. The note in the present case fell due on a Sunday, and it was proven by competent witnesses that when such discounted notes fell due on Sunday, it was the practice of the Bank to give such notice out for collection to the notary on the Monday following; and that demand was made and notice given on the same day; that such usage had been adopted by the Bank in the year 1846, after the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Cookendorfer vs. Preston. It was contended by the counsel for the defendant that no Bank in the city had a right of itself to establish such a usage; that the defendant was not bound by it, and that due diligence had not been used by the Bank in making the demand and in giving notice to the endorser, and that therefore the plaintiff, who had purchased the note of the Bank, had no right to recover.

The Court granted the prayer of the defendant to instruct the Jury that the plaintiff had no right to recover, and a verdict was rendered accordingly.

Johnson Hellen, Esq., appeared for the plaintiff, and J. H. Bradley, Esq., for the defendant.

Mr. Hellen filed a bill of exceptions for the purpose of bringing the case before the Supreme Court of the United States.

LONDON POLICE.—Some of the tricks of the swell mob at the Crystal Palace have been curious. One thief, dressed and looking like a gentleman, pretended to find a bug on a ladies dress, begging her to allow him to kill a noisome insect; and she now him take it off. She thanked him warmly, and off he went. Fortunately she immediately perceived that she had lost a valuable bracelet. She suspected her friend, went to a policeman and told what had passed. He said, are you sure you would know the man? She said she was certain she would. Then go and find him by the door till I come to you. She did so, and the policeman soon joined her. He had, by telegraph, had every door shut but the one they were at; they had not waited long when the lady said, that's the man. The person was taken into custody, searched, and on him was found a small box, full of bugs, and the lady's bracelet. Was not that a clever trick?

SURPRISING THE TURKS.—The Boston barque Stamboul, on the 1st of October arrived at Alexandria, Egypt, with a cargo of Massachusetts ice, the first ever brought to Egypt from any part of the world. "All Alexandria and the region round about," says a letter from the Captain of the Stamboul, "flocked on board and around her to see the 'frozen water.' The Pasha, the High Admiral, and all the chief officers of the Government, visited the barque, and inspected her cargo—and, after these, people of all degrees. She was literally crowded, while a block of ice remained in her." The entire cargo was purchased by the Government, and was all discharged and stored ashore in 48 hours after the vessel arrived.

☞ An accordeon is styled by the negroes at the South an "oddicated bellows."

CATTLE MARKETS.

PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 10.—The offerings of Beef Cattle for the week were about 1,500 head. Prices are selling from $5.50 to 7,00 per 100 lbs. Hogs—About 600 head in market, and sold from $6,00 to $1 per 100 lbs. Cows—About 100 in market, and sold at prices ranging from $15 to 30. Sheep and Lambs—The former from $3 to 4; the latter from $1 to 3, according to quality.

NEW YORK MARKETS, NOV. 8.

ASHES—A fair demand with sales of 100 bbls at $4,87½@4,94 for Pots, and $5,37½@5,44 for Pearls.

COTTON—The market continues steady, with sales of 1,000 bales.

FLOUR, &c.—Flour in fair demand. Sales 10,000 bbls at $5,25@5,87½ for State, and $5,31@6,06½ for Michigan, Ohio and Indiana. Southern Flour heavy; 1,300 bbls sold at $4@4,18¾. Rye Flour and Corn Meal unchanged.

GRAIN—Wheat market steady; sales of 10,000 bushels Canadian at 83c@85c, the former price for a common lot in store; 2,700 bushels Southern at 89c; 400 at 88, and 2,000 Genesee at 90. Rye is lower; sales 2,500 bushels at 72c, closing with no buyers at over 70. Sales 900 bushels Barley Malt at $1,05. Corn is firmer; sales 21,000 bushels at 56c@56½ for Western mixed, and 61 for round yellow. Oats are 30c@32c for State.

PROVISIONS.—Pork is dull, 300 bbls were sold at $15, and $12,50@13,00 for new Mess and Prime. Beef dull, 200 bbls sold at previous rates, and 170 bbls Beef Hams at $14@14,50. Dress Hogs are selling at 5c@6c. Lard heavy, 100 bbls sold at 8c@8½.

WHISKEY—In lower; sales 300 bbls at 24@24½, and 100 Drudge at 20½.

FREIGHTS.—2,000 bbls Flour were taken for Liverpool at 1s, and 40,000 bushels Wheat at 6d.

BAD BEHAVE, A DISAGREEABLE TASTE IN THE MOUTH, and other unpleasant symptoms, are the result of indigestion. When the food, instead of being properly dissolved, rests in the stomach until it ferments in a manner perfectly disgusting to the taste, called Sparks Acid, is generated, which, arising with the food of the mouth, is certain and only to give a bad breath, but in fact the whole system is poisoned by the gases, a deposit of tartar, and decayed teeth.

Wright's Indian Vegetable Pills not only prevent the stomach and bowels from becoming clogged with indigestion, and purify the blood, but they also restore the digestive organs to a healthy tone; and are therefore certain to remove a bad breath, and prevent a premature decay of the teeth.

Beware of Counterfeits!—The genuine will be found for sale by agents and dealers in all parts of the United States and Canadas.

Principal Office 169 Race Street, Philadelphia.

TRAVELLING AGENTS.

Mr. G. W. JAMES, No. 1 Hanover Street, Cincinnati, Ohio, is our general travelling agent for the Western States, assisted by J. T. Dent, W. Kennedy, Dr. J. Wadsworth, R. K. Greene, Alex. R. Lowe, James Rockefeller, Dr. Lee Edwards, Thomas Pound Isaac, and C. M. L. Wiseman. Each of the above persons have a commission of the Mayor of Cincinnati, with seal of the city, describing their persons, so there will be no risk in paying them, and we hope all on whom they may call, will make it convenient to settle with them.

Mr. HENRY M. LEWIS, of Montgomery, Alabama, is our general travelling agent for Alabama, and has associated with him D. S. Gaudens, James G. Lewis and Samuel D. Lewis.

Mr. ISRAEL R. JAMES, No. 169 South Tenth Street, Philadelphia, is our general Travelling Agent, assisted by William H. Weld, John Collins, James Darring, A. Kirk Wellington, H. A. Brown, John T. Lockey, P. Lewis, Jos. Beaton, Chas. P. Beaton, and Thos. D. Nice.

WILLIAM A. PIERCE is our only Collector of Bills in Pennsylvania.

A. PEASE collects for us in the New England States, and a portion of the State of New York.

MARIAN B. ANGELL collects for us in New York.

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

MAY be obtained weekly at the Periodical Depots

Of DEXTER & BROTHER, 43 Ann St., New York

Of HOTCHKISS & Co., Boston, Mass.

Of MILTON BOULEMENT, Mobile, Ala.

Of J. C. MORGAN, New Orleans, La.

Of W. TAYLOR & Co., Baltimore, Md.

Of F. HAGAN & Co., Nashville Tenn.

Of S. W. PEASE, 26 West South Street, and 30 East Pearl St., Cleveland, Ohio.

COURTENAY & WIENGES, Charleston, S. C.

Of W. ADAM, Washington, D. C.

Of ELI ADAMS, Salem, N. J.

Subscriptions will be received at either of the above mentioned Depots. But the proprietors of the SATURDAY EVENING POST are responsible only for money received directly by themselves, or through their authorized travelling agents.

Local News.

THE MAGNETIC TELEGRAPH CASE—IMPORTANT DECISION.—The United States Circuit Court, composed of Judges Grier and Kane, last week, made a decision in the case of French and others, of the Morse Line of Telegraph, against Sherman and Rogers and others, of the Bain line of Telegraphs from Washington to New York, which settles a number of important points important to those engaged in the business of telegraphing by electromagnetism, and to inventors generally. The Court decided all the questions in controversy in favor of the claimants under the Morse patents, and declares the process and apparatus used on the Bain line for telegraphing and recording signs at a distance, intelligible to any person, to be an infringement of the Morse patent. The ground relied on by the defendants was that the Morse patent was covered and protected by his patent, as new inventions, and are really new, either as single, independent, or as parts of a new combination for the purpose specified. 5. That the patent granted to Morse for his "Local Circuit" is valid, and that the "Branch Circuit" of Bain is not a infringement of it. 6. That the subject and principles of the chemical telegraph are clearly embraced in Morse's patents.

The above are the questions in dispute, and the opinion of the Court, delivered by Judge Kane, is clear and precise in their adjudication. The counsel for the complainants (Morse) were directed by the Court to prepare the draught of a decree, to be made by the Court in accordance with the prayer of the bill and the opinion of the Court, and to embrace in the course of his remarks upon the originality of Prof. Morse's invention, and the ingenuity displayed by him in overcoming the difficulties of his great discoveries, by devising new modes of attaining the same end as he attains makes some very just observations, which will be useful to those persons to be considered inventors. He says:

"They are no doubt all of them inventors as was the man who first conceived the idea of using metal into the practical semblance of the gray goose-quill, or first devised sympathetic ink, that the colors of the rainbow might be used in imitation of the profane. All these toiled ingeniously and well, to advance or embellish a pre-existing art. But they had no share in the discovery of the art itself, and no more claim to a monopoly of it than to that of the steel pen manufacturer, who first discovered that when such discounted notes fell due on Sunday, it was the practice of the Bank to give such notice out for collection to the notary on the Monday following; and that demand was made and notice given on the same day; that such usage had been adopted by the Bank in the year 1846, after the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Cookendorfer vs. Preston. It was contended by the counsel for the defendant that no Bank in the city had a right of itself to establish such a usage; that the defendant was not bound by it, and that due diligence had not been used by the Bank in making the demand and in giving notice to the endorser, and that therefore the plaintiff, who had purchased the note of the Bank, had no right to recover.

The Court granted the prayer of the defendant to instruct the Jury that the plaintiff had no right to recover, and a verdict was rendered accordingly.

Johnson Hellen, Esq., appeared for the plaintiff, and J. H. Bradley, Esq., for the defendant.

Mr. Hellen filed a bill of exceptions for the purpose of bringing the case before the Supreme Court of the United States.

LONDON POLICE.—Some of the tricks of the swell mob at the Crystal Palace have been curious. One thief, dressed and looking like a gentleman, pretended to find a bug on a ladies dress, begging her to allow him to kill a noisome insect; and she now him take it off. She thanked him warmly, and off he went. Fortunately she immediately perceived that she had lost a valuable bracelet. She suspected her friend, went to a policeman and told what had passed. He said, are you sure you would know the man? She said she was certain she would. Then go and find him by the door till I come to you. She did so, and the policeman soon joined her. He had, by telegraph, had every door shut but the one they were at; they had not waited long when the lady said, that's the man. The person was taken into custody, searched, and on him was found a small box, full of bugs, and the lady's bracelet. Was not that a clever trick?

BOARD OF HEALTH.—The number of deaths during the last week in this city was 156—adults 59, and children 97.

Bank Note List.

CORRECTED FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING POST, BY E. JOHNSTON & Co., BROKERS, No. 26 South Third Street.

PHILADELPHIA, November 15, 1851.

PENNSYLVANIA.
Philadelphia banks	par
Do. small notes	1/8 dis
Chambersburg	½ dis
York	½ dis
Gettysburg	no sale
Carlisle	½ dis
Lewistown	no sale
Brownsville	½ dis
Pittsburg	½ dis
Northumberland	½ dis
Washington	½ dis
Erie	1½ dis
Susquehanna co'orphans'	par
Lebanon	par
Lehigh county bk	no sale
Harrisburg	no sale
Honesdale	1 dis
Harrisburg	½ dis
West Branch	par
Wyoming	par
Middletown	½ dis
Northampton	no sale
Schuylkill Haven	par
Pottsville	par
Towanda	½ dis
Relief notes	1a1½ dis

NEW JERSEY.
Trenton, Mt. Holly,	par
Burlington, Salem,	½ dis
Camden, Medford,	par
Plainfield	closed
Bank at Morris	½ dis
State bk New Brun	½ dis
Newark	½ dis
Morris county	½ dis
Middletown Point	½ dis
Orange	½ dis
Belvidere	½ dis
Rahway	½ dis
Dover	½ dis
Perth Amboy	failed
Perguies, Patterson,	failed
Farmers and Mech.	½ dis
bk. N. Brun	½ dis

DELAWARE.
All solvent banks	par
Del City bk and del'r's	½ dis

MARYLAND.
Baltimore banks	½ dis
Mineral bank	½ dis
Salisbury	failed
Cecil bank	½ dis
Frederick county	½ dis
Cumberland	½ dis
Washington county	½ dis
Hagerstown	½ dis
Havre-de-Grace	failed
Far & Millers bk	no sale

DIST. OF COLUMBIA.
All solvent banks	½ dis

NEW YORK.
City banks	par a¼ dis
Safe country bks	½ dis
Interior bank	50 dis
Farmers, Mine	50 dis
Watson, White
Orange	..dis
New Rochelle	50 dis
Westchester	..dis

MAINE.
All solvent banks	1 dis

NEW HAMPSHIRE.
All solvent banks	1 dis

VERMONT.
Bank of St Albans	1 dis
All solvent banks	1 dis

CONNECTICUT.
All solvent banks	1 dis

MASSACHUSETTS.
All solvent banks	¼ dis
Do. small notes	½ dis
Fairhaven bk	failed
Mechanics and Mitten
stolen notes	no sale

RHODE ISLAND.
All solvent banks	¼ dis
Phœnix bk, Westerly
stolen notes	no sale

CANADA.
Montreal	3 dis

VIRGINIA.
Bk of Chesapeake, heal	1 dis
Far bk & branches	1½ dis
Valley bk & branch	1½ dis
Bk of Virginia branches	1½ dis
Wheeling	1½ dis

NORTH CAROLINA.
All solvent banks	1½ dis
Small notes	2½ dis
Country banks	2½ dis

SOUTH CAROLINA.
Bk of Wash D. C.	1½ dis
All solvent banks	1½ dis
Small notes	2½ dis

GEORGIA.
Bk of St. Mary's	2½ dis
Central bk of Mil	1½ dis
Georgia R R Co	1½ dis
Rockingham bks	2½ dis
All solvent banks	1½ dis
Small notes	2½ dis

ALABAMA.
Bk of Mobile	1 dis
Country banks	1 dis

MISSISSIPPI.
All banks	uncertain

LOUISIANA.
All solvent bks	1 dis

FLORIDA.
So. Life & Trust Co	.....

OHIO.
Bk of Wooster	50 dis
Bk Norwalk	70 dis
Bk of Toledo	50 dis
All solvent bks	1½ dis
Small notes	2½ dis

KENTUCKY.
All solvent bks	1½ dis
Small notes	2½ dis

INDIANA.
State bank	2½ dis
Small notes	2½ dis

ILLINOIS.
Bank of Illinois	90 dis
State bank	90 dis
Bank of Cairo	.....

MISSOURI.
All solvent bks	1½ dis

TENNESSEE.
All solvent bks	2½ dis
Bk East Tenn.	1½ dis

MICHIGAN.
Bk of Michigan	no sale
Far's & Mech's	2½ dis
Gov. Stock bk	uncertain

ARKANSAS.
All banks	no sale

WISCONSIN.
Mineral Point	.....
Bank of Milwaukie	.....

IOWA.
Miners bank	.....

Marriages.

On the morning of the 6th inst. at the Broad Street Baptist Church, by the Rev. J. L. Burrows, CHARLES PETERS, Publisher of the Boys' and Girls' Journal, to MARY M. youngest daughter of Jos. M. Hopper, Esq. of Frankford, N. J.

On the 6th inst. by the Rev. Joseph H. Tracy, aged 30, WILLIAM H. TRACY, aged 30, and on the 31st ult. WILLIAM G. LEWIS, aged 3 years, and on the 3d inst. JOHN F. LEW Selected Poetry.

BENEDICITE.

FROM AN UNPUBLISHED POEM.
BY JOHN G. WHITTIER.

God's blessing upon you, my friend and brother,
Broken this sad Alcestis and old
Like the dark tenants of thy hall.

Wrapped through my summer seasons
The blessed sun, my constant mistress,
Or not among the woodland blooms.

It freshens o'er thy threshold dear,
Deepening, in its glad contrast,
Beauty to beauty, grace to grace.

Fair Memories hover together round,
The old vows pushes that honor our bond,
The maple shadows crossbred;

The hills we climbed, the river seen
By glances rising in dewy recess—
All keep thy memory fresh and green.

Wherever I look, whatever I sing,
The thought goes with me on my way,
And hence this prayer I breathe to-day:

Our hopes of time and changes of season,
The wrong words which live between
Thyself and me, my heart I less.

These hold not Friendship's spell-word, nor
The half-unconscious power to draw
All hearts to thine by Love's sweet law.

With these good gifts of God to meet
Thy lot, and many a chosen thou hast
To hold the blessed angels feet.

I, thou, a fervent wish for thee
That gracious Heavens will hold from me,
What should, dear heart, its burden be?

The sighing of a shaken reed—
What can I more than meekly plead
The greatness of our common need?

God's love—unchanging, pure, and true—
The Providence white shining through,
His peace—the fall of Hermon's dew!

With such a prayer, on this sweet day,
As thou may'st hear and I may say,
I greet thee, dearest, far away!

National Era.

Leaves from History

REVOLUTIONS OF RUSSIA.

THE ACCESSION OF NICHOLAS I., 1825

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH OF ALEXANDRE DUMAS, WITH ADDITIONS AND ADDITIONS.

BY MISS JANE STRICKLAND.

The death of the Emperor Alexander placed the inhabitants of his Empire in mourning; for the grief and loyalty of the lower classes were sincere, and their attachment to his person eminent blindness in its character. The public feeling was increased by the prospect of the reign of an unpopular sovereign afflicted with mental malady, and devoid of courtesy.

As for the Grand-Duke Nicholas, no one thought of him, but the Russian people dreaded the accession of the Constantine whom they considered their sovereign in right of his primogeniture. In no country in the world has this natural law been so repeatedly broken. Every person in Russia was aware that the heir-presumptive had purchased his marriage with a Polish lady, the object of his ardent affections, by the resignation of his claims to the succession, but that he would abide by that act seemed a conjecture too improbable to be entertained by any one. Constantine's own, nevertheless, observe when he abandoned his rights, and he heard in fact of the present brother that he was so, by his youngest brother, the Grand Duke Michael, through whom he forwarded a letter, confirming his resignation of the throne, and acknowledging his next brother as his sovereign. The courier from St. Petersburg crossed the Grand-Duke Michael, and brought letters from Nicholas, acknowledging Constantine as his Emperor, and urging him to ascend the throne. The wife of Constantine joined her endeavors to those of the next heir, with rare devotion offered to resign her coronation rather than that he should give up the Empire for her. Constantine, over whose mental agitation the soothing influence of the fair Pole possessed a magical power, confirmed first in his resolution to remain in the condition of a subject, and he adhered to the determination he had expressed in the important document of which the Grand-Duke Michael was the bearer, and which is here subjoined:—

"HE VERY DEAR BROTHER,—

"I received yesterday, with feelings of profound sorrow, intelligence of the death of our adored sovereign, and my benefactor, the Emperor Alexander. In hastening to assure you of the painful feelings this misfortune has excited in my mind, I do only my duty in announcing to you that I have forwarded to Her Imperial Majesty, our august mother, a letter, in which I declare that, in consequence of the renewal I obtained from the late Emperor, bearing date February the 2nd, 1822, permitting my renunciation of the throne, to have my resolution to this termination to give up to you all my rights to the Empire of Russia. I entreated, at the same time, our beloved mother, to make this declaration publish, that the same may be put into immediate execution. After this declaration, I regard it as a sacred duty to beseech your Imperial Majesty to receive the first from me, the oath of fidelity, submission, and permit me to say that I do not aspire to any other title or dignity than that of Czarowitz, with which my august brother honored me by my services. My only happiness, hereafter, will consist in giving your Imperial Majesty continual proofs of my unbounded devotion and respect for your person, and of which thirty years of unalterable observance to the Emperors, my father and brother, are the pledge, in which sentiments I wish to serve your Imperial Majesty, and your successors, until the end of my life, in my present situation and functions.

"I am, with the most profound respect,

"CONSTANTINE."

Upon the receipt of the despatches which followed this letter, the Grand-Duke, under a reign over a vast Empire, by the repeated abdication of his brother of the rights of primogeniture, no longer hesitated,—he published the former correspondence between the Emperor Alexander and the Grand-Duke Constantine, with the document already quoted, upon the 25th of December, 1825, and fixed the manner for his recognition as their sovereign by his people.

The inhabitants of St. Petersburg, relieved from their fears of a second Paul, by the abdication of the hair-preparative, began to collect with hope upon the promise which the talents and pure moral character of their new sovereign afforded them. The handsomest and bravest men in his dominions, his fine person attracted attention, while his reserved manners excited awe. His grave carriage, his downcast look; only raised to penetrate to the soul the man who ventured to observe him, with a glance which compelled him to know and reverence his master—his haughty manner of interrogation, so unlike the courtly of Alexander, or the bluntness of Constantine, had insisted him from the rest of the imperial family, and centred him in the bosom of his own domestic circle. The Russian people, dazzling their need of a guide, at once comprehended that the cold dignity of this prince concealed an indomitable will, and that, if they themselves had not chosen their new sovereign, God had considered their need, and given to the Russians, who were at once too polished and too barbarous, a man who would grasp the sceptre in an iron hand covered with a velvet glove.

The morrow, though considered as a day of joy and festivity, was preceded by some rumors that, like the breath of an approaching tempest, gave warning that some great national crisis was at hand. It was whispered in the evening of the 25th, that the abdication of the Czarowitz was a forgery, and that Constantine, then executing the authority of Viceroy of Poland, was on full march for St. Petersburg with an army to claim the Empire as his birthright. In addition to the startling rumor, it was said that several regiments, and among them that of Moscow, had determined to take the oath to no Russian prince but Constantine; and the words, "Let Nicholas live, but let Constantine reign," were heard at intervals in the streets, as an intimation of the state of the military palace.

In fact, the conspiracy which had disturbed the last days of the Emperor Alexander was about to raise its head, and arise upon the Grand-Duke Constantine's name as its rallying point. This prince, who had passed his life with the army, was beloved by the soldiers, and the conspirators, who understood little of the character of their new sovereign, supposed the revolt of the regiments stationed in St. Petersburg would compel him to resign his recently acquired rights. They would then summon Constantine to receive the Empire, and with it the Constitution they had prepared. If he refused to accept it, they intended to imprison him and the rest of the imperial family. They would then establish a Republic, an oligarchy in which the despotism of the many would replace the despotism of one. Such was the design of a party composed of military aristocrats, who, bolder than the murderers of Paul, dared, by open force and armed hand, to subdue the throne of Russia with its new sovereign. The soldiers, deceived in Constantine, they designed to make their blind instruments in a conspiracy of which that prince was not the real object, but their own aggrandizement.

Faithful to their plans, the Prince Trubetzkoi and the two Princes —— went to the barracks of the 3rd, 2nd, 1st, and 4th companies of the Regiment of Moscow, whom they knew to be devoted to Constantine. The princes then assembled the officers of the regiment, and the Colonel Chevalier Alexander Bestoujeff, and Lieutenant-Colonel Alexander D——, to their attention, whom in effect had been sent down Wismar to warn them against taking the oath to the Grand-Duke Nicholas. The officers of Alexander Bestoujeff's battalion, confirming the astonishing communication, shouted a great exultation among the troops, of which the prince took advantage by ordering them to load with ball cartridge. At that moment Count Orloff Denisoff and Major General Frederickz, who commanded the grenadiers, having the charge of the flag, came to invite the officers to visit the colonel of the regiment. Prince Gallitzin, who believed the favorable moment was come, ordered the soldiers to repulse the grenadiers with cross-de-crosses, and to take away their flag, at the same time throwing himself upon Major General Frederickz, whom D——, on the other side, struck down with a pistol, with the shock of which he killed him in the family-face, turning upon Major Shoulden, commander of the brigade, who ran to the assistance of his colleagues, he inserted him down in a moment, and flinging himself among the grenadiers, successively wounded Grenadier Kranofski, Colonel Khotinski-Schiloki, and Schaleiev Kourakoff, and cutting his way to the flag, seized and elevated it with a loud and triumphant hurrah. To that cry, and to the sight of the blood on hostile steel to the flag, the greater part of the regiment replied, "Long live Constantine! down with Nicholas!" Prince Shakoff——, followed by four hundred men whom he had induced from their duty, then marched, with drums beating, to the Admiralty quarter.

At the gate of the Winter Palace, the aide-de-camp, the bearer of the news of the revolt, encountered another officer, who brought tidings from the barracks of the grenadier corps of equally alarming import. When that regiment were preparing to take the oath of fidelity to the Emperor Nicholas, the sub-Lieutenant Kojoukhof threw himself before the advanced guard, exclaiming, "It is not the Grand-Duke Nicholas we ought to make oath, but to the Emperor Constantine." He was told that the Czarowitz had abdicated in his next brother's favor. "It is false," was his reply; "totally false; he is on the march for St. Petersburg to regard the faithful and punish the guilty."

The regiment, notwithstanding these exterior, continued in its march, took the oath of allegiance to the new sovereign, and returned into quarters, without showing any disposition resembling revolt. At dinner-time Lieutenant Sutkof, who had taken the pledge of obedience with the rest, entered at that moment, and addressed himself to his own company in a manner calculated to excite their attention: "My friends, we were wrong to obey the order; the other regiments are in open revolt; they have refused to take the oath. We are at this moment in the Place of the Senate;—put on your uniforms, arms, come on, and follow me: I have your pay in my pocket, which I am ready to distribute without waiting for the ceremony of an order."

"But in what you say quite true?" cried many voices.

"Stay, here is Lieutenant Sutkof—He myself, one of your best friends—ask him."

"My friends," remarked Panoff, anticipating their question, "you all know that Constantine is your only lawful Emperor, and that they wish to dethrone him."

"Live, Constantine!" replied the soldiers.

"Live, Nicholas!" exclaimed Colonel Stutler, the commander of the regiment, throwing himself consequently into the hall. "They are deceiving you, my friends; the Czarowitz has abdicated, and you have now no other Emperor than the Grand-Duke Nicholas. Live, Nicholas!"

"Live, Constantine!" responded the soldiers.

"You are mistaken, soldiers; you are about to take a fatal step; you are deceived," again shouted the Colonel.

"Comrades, do not abandon me; follow me," cried Panoff; "let those who are for Constantine, unite with me to the cry, 'Long live Constantine!'"

"To the Admiralty! to the Admiralty!" said Panoff, drawing his sword; "follow me, soldiers, follow me."

With a wild hurrah, two hundred soldiers followed their leader to the place he indicated, whether, though by a different route, the lieutenant portion of the regiment of Moscow had already preceded them.

Miloradovich, the Military Governor of St. Petersburg, a cavalry general, whose splendid charges on the field had gained him the appellation of the Russian Murat, was by this time at the palace, to communicate to his new sovereign the dispositions he had made for the defence of his throne and the capital. He had directed the troops upon whose fidelity he could most safely rely, to march to the Winter Palace. The first battalion of the regiment Preobrajenskki, three regiments of the guard Pavlowski, and the battalion of the Sappers and Miners, were those he considered fit for this important service.

The Emperor saw them that the motley was more general than he anticipated; he therefore sent by Major General Moldhart, to carry orders to the Semenowski Guard to repress the mutineers, and to the Horse-Guards, to hold themselves in readiness to mount. He next drew himself to the corps of chief guards of the Winter Palace, where the regiment of Finland Guards were at that time on duty, and ordered them to load their muskets and invest the principal avenues of the palace. At that very moment, tumultuous sounds interrupted the voice of the Sovereign, occasioned by the approach of the third and sixth companies of the Regiment of Moscow, headed by Prince Stahkoff——, and the two E——, with the captured flag proudly displayed to the wind, and drums beating in the ominous cry of "Long live Constantine! Down with Nicholas!" The rebel troops debouched on the Admiralty Square, but whether they thought themselves not sufficiently strong, or that that they dreaded facing Majesty with these irrepressible demonstrations, they did not march upon the Winter Palace, but took up their position against the Senate, where they were immediately joined by the grenadier corps, and sixty men in frocks with pistols in their hands, who mingled themselves among the rebel soldiers.

The Emperor at this crisis appeared from under one of the arches of the palace, approached the grating, and threw a rapid glance on his revolted subjects. He was paler than usual, but was composed and calm. It was whispered that he had resolved to die as became a Christian Emperor, and that he had confessed and received the absolution of the Church, before he took leave of his family. Every eye was fixed upon him, when the hard gallop of a squadron of cuirassiers was heard on the side of the marble palace; it was the Horse Guards, headed by Count Orloff, one of the bravest and most faithful friends of the Emperor. Before him the gates expanded; he leaped from his charger, while the regiment ranged itself before the palace. The roll of the drums announced instantly the approach of the grenadiers of Preobrajenskoi, which arrived in battalions. They entered the court of the palace, where they found the Emperor with the Empress, and their eldest son, the little Grand Duke Alexander; behind them were ranged the Chevalier Guard, who formed an angle with the cuirassiers, leaving between them an open space, which was quickly filled up by the artillery. The revolted regiments regarded these military dispositions with apparent carelessness, while their cries of "Long live Constantine!" "Down with Nicholas!" evidently proved that they expected, and waited there for reinforcements.

While affairs were in this state at the palace, the Grand-Duke Michael, at the barracks, was opposing his personal influence to the flood-tide of rebellion. Some happy results had followed these attempts, and the bold resolution taken by Count Lieven, Captain of the sixth company of the Regiment of Moscow, who arrived in time to shut the gates against the battalion, then about to join their rebel comrades. Fleeing himself before the soldiers, he drew his sword, and swore on his honor to pass the weapon through the body of the first man who should make a sedition movement to re-open them. At this threat a young Sub-Lieutenant advanced, pistol in hand, towards Count Lieven, with the evident intention of blowing out his brains. The Duke, with admirable presence of mind, struck the officer a blow with the pommel of his sword, which made the lieutenant leap from his hand; the Lieutenant took up the pistol and once more took aim at the Count. The young nobleman crossed his arms, and confronted the mutinous officer, while the regimental, music and musicians, looked on like the seconds of this singular duel. The Lieutenant fired from a few steps, followed by the heroic Count, who offered him his unarmed breast as in defiance of his attempt. The Lieutenant fired, but the ball took no effect: that it did not strike that generous breast, appeared miraculous. Some one touched at the door.

"Who is there?" asked many voices.

"His Imperial Highness the Grand-Duke Michael," replied those without.

Some instants of profound silence followed this announcement. Count Lieven availed himself of the general stupefaction to open the door, no person attempting to prevent that action.

The Grand-Duke entered on horseback, followed by the officers of ordnance.

"What means this inaction at a moment of danger?" asked the Grand-Duke. "Am I among friends or loyal soldiers?"

"You are in the midst of the most intimate of your regiments," replied the Count, "of which your original Majesty was first lieutenant-colonel; these are your faithful soldiers, my friend."

"Long live the Emperor Nicholas!" shouted the soldiers with one voice.

The magnanimity moved and convinced the disloyal officers.

"Lieven, I confide to you the constant of this regiment," remarked the Grand-Duke, emphatically.

"I will answer for its loyalty with my life, your Imperial Highness," replied the Count.

The Grand-Duke departed, and on his mounds, if he received no enthusiastic greeting, at least on the officer pistol, chastisement to the authority of the Emperor Nicholas.

Reinforcements came in on every side; the Sappers and Miners drew up in order of battle, before the palace of the Hermitage; the rest of the Regiment of Moscow, warned from the 'side of rebellion by the courage and address of Count Lieven, now proudly distinguished by the Perspective of Finnish. The sight of these troops gave a definitive hope to the revolted, who, believing them to be on their side, greeted them with loud cries; and the grenadiers impatiently endeavored, for the new-comers ranged themselves along the Rotel of the Tribunals, facing the palace, and with the Colonadon, Anthony, and Chevalier Guards, enclosed the revolted in a circle of steel.

A moment after, they heard the chant of the priests. It was the Patriarch, who came out of the church of Casan, followed by all his clergy, and preceded by the holy banner. He now addressed the revolted "in the name of Heaven, to return to their duty." The soldiers, for the first time perhaps in their lives, regarded with contempt the pictures which they had been accustomed from infancy to regard with superstitious veneration, and they desired the Patriarch "to let them alone, since if heavenly things belonged to the priestly jurisdiction, they could take care of those of earth." The Patriarch continued his injunctions to obedience, notwithstanding his discouraging refusal, but the Emperor ordered him to desist and retire.

Nicholas himself was resolved to make one effort to bring back these rebels to their duty.

Those who surrounded the Emperor wished to prevent him from risking his person, but he coldly replied, "It is my game that is playing, and it is but fair play on my part to set my life on the stake."

He ordered the gate to be opened, but scarcely had he been obeyed, before the Grand-Duke Michael approached him, and whispered in his ear that that part of the Regiment Preobrajenski by which he was then surrounded, had made common cause with the rebels, and that the Prince T——, their commander, whose absence he had remarked with astonishment, was at the head of the conspiracy. Nicholas remembered that four-and-twenty years before the same regiment had kept guard before the red palace, while its Colonel, Prince Talitzen, strangled the Emperor Paul, his father.

His situation was terrible, but he did not even change countenance; he only showed that he was not formed to desperate resolutions. In an instant he turned and gave his orders to one of his Generals, "Bring me hither the Grand-Duke."

The General returned with the young Prince: the Emperor raised the boy in his arms, and advancing to the grandiose, said, "Soldiers, if I am killed, behold your sovereign. Open your ranks; I confide him to your loyalty."

A long, loud hurrah, a cry of enthusiasm that came from the very heart of those who expected death, re-echoed in that of the Emperor whose magnanimous confidence had won their admiration. The most guilty among them dropped their weapons and opened their arms to receive the heir of the Empire. The imperial pledge was placed with the colors in the midst of the regiment, a guarded and sacred asylum for honor and innocence.

The Emperor mounted his horse and went out of the gate, where he was met by his Generals, who implored him not to go any further, as the rebels apparently avowed their intention of killing their sovereign, and their arms were loaded. The Emperor made a sign to them with his hand to leave him a free passage, and forbidding them to accompany him, spurred his horse and galloped forward till he arrived within pistol-shot. "Soldiers," cried he, "I am told that you wish to kill me. Is that true? If it is, here I am."

There was a pause, while the Emperor sat on his horse, motionless like an equestrian statue between the two bodies of troops. Twice the word fire was heard among the rebel ranks, and twice some feeling of respect to the dauntless courage of the sovereign restrained the execution of the order; but at the third command some muskets loaded with ball were discharged, which whistled past the Emperor without striking him, but wounded, at a hundred paces behind him, Colonel Valho and many soldiers.

At that instant the Grand-Duke Michael and Count Miloradovich galloped towards the Emperor, the Regiment of Cuirassiers and those of the Chevalier Guards made a forward movement—the Artilleryman were about to apply their matches to the cannon.

"Halt," cried the Emperor. All obeyed. "General," said he to Count Miloradovich, "go to those unfortunate men, and endeavor to bring them to their allegiance."

While the Count and the Grand-Duke Michael rode forward, but the rebels received them with a shower of ball, accompanied by their war-cry, "Live, Constantine!"

"Soldiers," cried the Count, who was conspicuous alike by his fine martial figure and splendid uniform, covered with orders,—"Soldiers, behold this sabre," and he flourished above his head a magnificent Turkish one, the hilt of which was set with jewels, and advancing with it in the front ranks of the rebels, he continued,—"This sabre was given me by his Imperial Highness the Czarowitz, and on my honor, I will make oath upon its blade, that you have been deceived, that the Czarowitz has abdicated the imperial crown, and that your real and legitimate sovereign is the Emperor Nicholas."

Cries of "Live, Constantine!" and the report of a pistol, were the replies given by the revolted to the address of the Count, whom action with the sword arm had left his side exposed to the enemy. He was soon to rest in the saddle. Another pistol was aimed at the Grand-Duke Michael, but the soldiers of the Horse, though inclined in the revolt, seized the arm of the assassin.

Count Orloff and the cuirassiers faced the fire of the musketry, and enveloped in their ranks the wounded Miloradovich, the Grand-Duke Michael, and the Emperor Nicholas, whom they carried off by force to the palace.

The Count, wounded to death, set his horse with difficulty, and the moment he arrived at the palace fell into the arms of those who surrounded him.

The Emperor, notwithstanding the late unfortunate attempt, still wished to make one last endeavor to bring back the revolted, but while he was issuing orders to that effect, the Grand-Duke Michael seized the match: "Fire," cried he, "fire upon the assassins." At that moment four cannons opened upon the rebels, and paid with usury the double they had sent into the loyal ranks of the imperialists. Before the voice of the Emperor could stop the slaughter, a second discharge followed the first. The effect of these volleys within reach of pistol shot was terrible.

More than sixty men of the grenadier corps of the Regiment of Moscow and the Marine Guards fell; the rebel troops fled, some by the street Galernaia, some by the English quay or by the bridge Isaac, others across the frozen waters of the Neva, then a plain of ice, but all were hotly pursued by the Chevalier Guards at full gallop.

That evening Count Miloradovich, who was struggling with the agonies of death, expressed a wish to see the bullet which had given him his mortal wound. The chirurgeon, who had successfully traced and extracted the ball, put it into his patient's hand. The expiring warrior carefully examined the missive, its weight, and form, and found it deficient in calibre. "I am satisfied," said he, "that ball was aimed by no soldier." Five minutes after these words, he breathed his last. He then paid the debt of nature, the only debt he ever paid in his life. Handsome, valiant, the finest horseman in the army, and the idol of his own soldiers, the Russian Murat lost his life by the hand of a Russian, but not of a Russian soldier. The first of a dynasty King of Naples, lived display in every shape; but the field of battle, at the head of his cavalry, was the theatre on which he best loved to exhibit his martial form, splendid harness, ship, and daring courage. The gaming-table found him as reckless of his fortune as the field of his life, and the bravest Cavalry General in the Russian service, was a ruined gamester, loaded with debts which his death acquitted by leaving him insolvent. In paying the debt of nature, Count Miloradovich surrendered his only personal possession.

The next day, at nine o'clock in the morning, while the population of his capital was yet undecided whether the rebellion was effectually crushed, Nicholas, Emperor of Russia, gave his hand to the Empress to assist her into a droshki which stood before the gates of the Winter Palace, and drove through the streets of St. Petersburg. He stopped before the barracks as if to offer his hand himself to the widow or the friend of the comrade. The sight of his fine countenance, disclosed by the bowing plumes of his military hat, the fresh and young Semenoskis declared that they had never loved him so much as at that moment. His Irish blood forbade him displaying his ignorance, and what to do he could not tell. He wandered up and down the hall, closely observing the movements of his fellow-servants, but could hear or see nothing which came up to his notions of a napkin. Almost in despair, he came to the conclusion, as the best way of getting out of the dilemma, to call a falsehood. Approaching the gentleman, (who had been already waited upon by another servant) he said—

"Pats, sir, pa' will ye be plased to take anothin' else, the napkins is all are up!"

"Napkins are up—you are mistaken, surely."

"Pon the honor of a gintleman, I be not," replied Patrick in a polite whisper, "the gintleman all preferred them to the praties, and not a scrap be left for ye."

The gentleman now observed that Patrick was a strange servant, and immediately suspected the cause of the case. The story was soon passed round the table, and "Patrick and the Napkins," followed the wine, as it passed from friend to friend during dinner.—Nashville Union.

SCRAPS FROM THE ALBANY DUTCHMAN.

A TO CURE DRAFFNESS.—Tell a man you've come to pay him money. It heals accounts all hollow. Amateurs may practice by calling at the office of the Dutchman.

PROOF OF INSANITY.—One of our Courts decided the other day, that a man was insane, "because he paid money to a lawyer without taking a receipt."

☞ A friend of ours says he would always have remained single, but he couldn't afford it. What it cost him for "gals and ice cream," in the days when he was pop to help a wife and eight children. Bachelors should think of this.

☞ A Western poet in speaking of the moon, says:—"She laid her cheek upon a cloud like beauty on a young man's bosom." Two to one he had been sitting up with a late spencer, lately.

☞ Dobbs says that beauties generally die old maid. They not much a value on themselves that they don't find a purchaser till the market is closed.

A PLEURISY JOKE.—In a neighboring county, one of the political parties had, for over twenty years been in the habit of holding their county nominating conventions at the house of Mr. G——.

He happened on a recent occasion, for the first time, to be in when they had finished their business, and heard a little delegate from E—— move that "this convention do now adjourn sine die."

"Sine die," said Mr. G——, to a person standing near, "where is that?"

"Why—that's 'way up in the Northern part of the county," said his neighbor.

"Hold on, if you please, Mr. Chairman," said G——, with great enthusiasm and earnestness—"hold on, sir. I'd like to be heard on that question. I have kept a public house, now, for more'n twenty years. I'm a poor man. I've always belonged to the party, and never split my ticket in my life. This is the most central location in the county, and it's where we've always held our caucuses. I've never had, or asked an office, and have worked night and day for the party, and now I think, sir, it's mean. It's unsympathetic, to go to adjourning this convention away up to sine die."

FOUND HIM AT LAST.—Mrs. Jemima Jigson never could go to bed without first looking underneath to see if somebody was not stowed away there. But her search had always been bootless. At last, however, one night she spied, (or thought she did, which is all the same,) the long looked-for boots and legs.

"Oh! Mr. Jigson! Mr. Jigson!" the screamed out, "there's a man under the bed!"

"Is there?" coolly drawled her husband—"well, my dear, I am glad you have found him at last. You have been looking for him these twenty years."

☞ We remember of hearing of an old lady "Down East," who, after having kept a hired man on four near a month, one day said to him: "Mr. ——, I don't know as you like liver."

"Oh, yes," said he, "I like it very well for fifty or sixty meals, but I don't think I should like it for a steady diet." The pantaloons old lady served up something else for the next collation.

SINGULAR EFFECT OF THE PRESSURE.—The extreme pressure in the money market has effected coin very materially. We notice that the pillars have been squeezed from the fragments, sixpences, and quarters in this region. —Boston Museum.

For Housekeepers.

ORANGE PUDDING.—Half a pound of butter, half a pound of sugar, five eggs, two table spoonful of brandy, the rind of an orange. Lay the rind of an orange to soak over night. The next day boil it and mash it fine. It must be boiled in fresh water. Beat the butter and sugar on for cake. Whisk the eggs and add to it, then stir in the flour and orange. Cover your pie plates with rich paste, fill them and bake in a moderate oven.

ALMOND PUDDING.—Half a pound of butter, half a pound of sugar, five eggs, six ounces of sweet almonds, two ounces of bitter almonds, half a gill of rose-water. Blanch the almonds, pound them in a mortar to a paste with a little rose-water. Stir the butter and sugar to a cream—Whisk the eggs, mix all the ingredients together, line your pie plates with paste, fill them, and bake them as directed for other puddings.

COCOA-NUT PUDDING, No. 1.—A quarter of a pound of sugar, a quarter of a pound of cocoa-nut, three ounces of butter, the whites of six eggs, half a glass of wine and brandy mixed, one table spoonful of rose-water. Beat the butter and sugar smooth, which the eggs and add to it, then stir in the grated nut and liquor. Cover your pie plates with rich crust, fill them with the mixture, and bake in a moderate oven.

COCOA-NUT PUDDING, No. 2.—Half a pound of sugar, half a pound of butter, one pound of nut, eight eggs, the whites only, half a gill of wine and brandy mixed, one table spoonful of rose-water. Peel off the outer skin of the cocoa-nut, grate it and stir it into the butter and sugar, which must be beaten to a cream. Add the brandy, wine, and rose-water, then the whites of the eggs, which must be whipped till they are stiff. Bake in a puff paste.—National Cook Book.

Wit and Humor.

LAST HOURS OF A SINGLE GENTLEMAN.

This morning, November 11, at half-past 11 o'clock precisely, an unfortunate young man, Mr. Edward Finchney, underwent the extreme penalty of infatuation, by expiating his attachment to Mary Ann Gale, in front of the altar rail of St. Mary's Church, Kensington.

It will be in the recollection of all those friends of the parties who were at Jones's party at Brixton, two years ago, that Mr. Finchney was there and then first introduced to Mary Gale, to whom he instantly began to direct particular attentions—dancing with her no less than six sets that evening, and handing her things at supper in the most devoted manner. From that period commenced the intimacy between them which terminated in this morning's catastrophe.

Poor Finchney had barely attained his twenty-eighth year; but there is no reason to believe that but for reasons of a pecuniary nature, his single life would have come earlier to an untimely end. A change for the better, however, having occurred in his circumstances, the young lady's friends were induced to sanction his addresses, and thus became accessories to the cause by which he has just perished.

The unhappy deceased had the last night of his bachelor existence in his solitary chamber. From half past eight to ten he was engaged in writing letters. Shortly after, his younger brother, Henry, knocked at the door, when the doomed youth told him to come in. On being asked when he meant to go to bed, he replied—"Not yet." The question was then put to him how he thought he should sleep? to which he answered, "I don't know." He then suppressed his desire for a cigar and a glass of grog. His brother, who sat down and partook of the like refreshments, now demanded if he would take anything more that night. He said "nothing," in a firm voice. His affectionate brother then rose to take leave, when the devoted one considerately advised him to take care of himself.

Precisely at a quarter of a minute to seven the next morning, the victim of Cupid having been called, according to his desire, his room and himself were approached by the executioner, Mr. Calcraft, in shave himself without the slightest injury; for not even a scratch upon his chin appeared after the operation. It would seem that he had devoted a longer time than usual at his toilet.

The wretched man was attired in a light blue dress coat, with frosted buttons, a white vest and trousers, with patent leather boots, —he wore round his neck a variegated satin cravat, partly concealed the Cerberus of the bosom. In front of the scarf was inserted a breastpin of conspicuous dimensions.

Having descended the staircase with a quick step, he entered the apartment where his brother and a few friends awaited him. He then shook hands with all present; and on being asked how he slept, answered—"Very well," and to the further demand as to the state of his mind, he said that he "felt happy."

One of the party spectators suggested that it would be as well to take something before the melancholy ceremony was gone through, he exclaimed with some emphasis, "decidedly."—Breakfast was accordingly served, when he ate a French roll, a large round toast, two sausages, and three new laid eggs, which he washed down with three great breakfast cups of tea. In reply to an expression of astonishment on the part of persons present, he declared that he had never felt heartier in his life.

Having inquired the time, and ascertained that it was ten minutes to eleven, he remarked that it would soon be over. His brother then inquired if he could do anything for him: when he said he should like to have a glass of ale. Having drank this he appeared to be satisfied.

The fatal moment now approached, he devoted the remaining portion of his time to distributing among his friends those little articles he would no longer want. To one he gave his cigar case, to another his tobacco stopper, and he charged his brother Henry with his latch key, with instructions to deliver it after all was over, with due solemnity, to the landlady.

The clock at length struck eleven, and at the same moment he was informed that a cab was at the door. He merely said, "I am ready," and allowed himself to be conducted to the vehicle, into which he got with his brother, his friends following on behind in others.

Arrived at the fatal spot, a short, but anxious delay of some seconds took place; after which they were joined by the lady with her friends. Little was said on either side, but Miss Gale, with customary decorum, shed tears.—Finchney endeavored to preserve decorum, but a slight twitching in his mouth and eyebrows proclaimed his inward agitation.

All necessary preliminaries having now been settled, and the prescribed ceremony forthwith gone through, the usual question was put—"Will thou have this woman to be thy wife?" To which the rash youth replied in a distinct voice, "I will."

He then put the fatal ring on Miss Gale's finger, the hymenial noose was adjusted, and the poor fellow was launched into matrimony.—London Punch.

A GOOD REASON.—An Irish travelling merchant, alias a peddler, asked an itinerant pedlar the price of a pair of fowls.

"Six shillings, sir."

"Is my countrey, my darling, you might buy them for sixpence a pare."

"Why didn't you remain in your own dear country, then?"

"Cause, we have no sixpence, my jewel," said Pat.

TO DRESS A CALF'S HEAD.—Take your head and rub it a thick lather all over the face, then pare off with a sharp instrument. Wipe well with a clean towel, and place pieces of slanted bacon fat over top of the cheeks. Lard the brows with any kind of grease—a few drops of oil may be on hand—answered—and your calf's head will be dressed in the most approved style.

Going to the Party.

A NICE "FIX" FOR A YOUNG LADY.

RANDOLPH TUCKER.—I never can go in, I can't, really.

HIS SISTER CORNIE.—Why, I've been hunting you this half hour. What are you afraid of—They won't eat you. Oh, you are a pretty cousin to go to a party with. Dear, how stupid I shall look.

ABOUT NAPKINS.

A few days since the Burnet Hotel folks found it necessary to procure another table servant. After searching in vain for an experienced waiter, they concluded to engage a genteel young Irishman, whom only truth was that he had never seen the interior of a dining-room in a fashionable hotel. His duty was laid down to him in plain words, and particular pains taken to instruct him in the part he was expected to perform. Patrick—for certainly that was his name—did as well. He was polite as a Parisian dancing master, and almost as swift in his movements as a locomotive. Everybody was pleased with him.

At length, however, a gentleman requested Pat to bring him a napkin. Now this was an article he had never met with in all his life, and to save his soul from purgatory he could not tell what the gentleman meant. His Irish blood forbade him displaying his ignorance, and what to do he could not tell. He wandered up and down the hall, closely observing the movements of his fellow-servants, but could hear or see nothing which came up to his notions of a napkin. Almost in despair, he came to the conclusion, as the best way of getting out of the dilemma, to tell a falsehood. Approaching the gentleman, (who had been already waited upon by another servant) he said—

"Pats, sir, pa' will ye be plased to take anothin' else, the napkins is all are up!"

"Napkins are up—you are mistaken, surely."

"Pon the honor of a gintleman, I be not," replied Patrick in a polite whisper, "the gintleman all preferred them to the praties, and not a scrap be left for ye."

The gentleman now observed that Patrick was a strange servant, and immediately suspected the cause of the case. The story was soon passed round the table, and "Patrick and the Napkins," followed the wine, as it passed from friend to friend during dinner.—Nashville Union.

Selected Articles.

THE ONLY SON.

BY JUNIPER.

The only boy 'mid a dozen girls
Is always a very king—
Indulged and petted, his will is law,
And he rules in everything;
For as father and mother, with loving eyes,
Glance over each cherished one,
The smile of affection sweetest rests
On the darling only son.

Ah! woe to the innocent, hapless girls,
'Neath an only brother's sway;
He's always spoiling their every plans
In the most provoking way;
He laughs as they search for their hidden toys,
And thinks it capital fun—
Ah! 'mid the mischievous race of boys,
There's none like the only one!

They must be content with the poorest things,
Without a word or sigh,
For he always claims the sweetest cakes,
And the largest piece of pie.
They must always bear with a patient grace
The mischief that he has done,
For an adept in artful wiles and pranksishness
Is the petted only son.

He throws their playthings in the fire,
And laughs to see them burn;
He puts the cat in his father's boots,
And the dog in his mother's churn;
But his mischief is met by approving smiles,
When 'tis found by whom 'twas done,
For what would be blamed in another child
Is praised in the only son. Casper Bag.

WORDS ABOUT ART.

[The cost of criticism in relation to pictures by "Old Masters," and the custom of exciting the productions of dead masters over the works of equally, if not more deserving modern painters, is well hit off by the Florence correspondent of the National Intelligencer:]

The galleries of the Uffizzi and of the Pitti Palace, did not profane the overwhelming effect which I thought they would. I saw in them a great many bad paintings, and some good ones, but none that filled my mind with that rapture which I had expected from the works of art. My artist friend to whom I spoke of the disappointment, said that this was always the case with those who were not familiar with the beauties and mysteries of the art; that a better knowledge of the works of the great masters would change my views; that they require to be studied long, and the eye to become educated, before they can be appreciated; in short, that the mind of the beholder must be elevated to a certain standard before he can form any idea of them.

Now, I admit that it appears like presumption to disparage what the judgment of mankind for ages has pronounced good; yet, as I have not yet arrived at that exalted state of mind which they say is necessary for the appreciation of true art, I will give you candidly my impressions, not expecting, of course, that my poor judgment will do the least injury to any body. After a pretty careful study of the best works in all the galleries of Europe, I feel entirely convinced that a vast deal of nonsense has been written about the old masters, and that there is quite as much good painting in the world now as there ever was, and a great deal more taste. It is not fashionable to say so, but one cannot help, it, if he thinks so, which is just the case with me. I think that there is a better and purer taste now than there was in old times; that artists of our day would be ashamed to make such monstrosities as are exhibited in the celebrated galleries as some of the choice gems of antiquity. Yet artists will not own to this, because to own it would be regarded as presumption. Connoisseurs will not say so, because it is always safer to adhere to the conservative side. Hence, if all the merits of every living artist were concentrated in one work, it would be pronounced inferior to something which had preceded it. Michael Angelo understood this principle in human nature thoroughly, when he mutilated a portion of his Bacchus and Faun, made the work antique by burying it in the earth, and had this mutilation urban it was dug up, of bearing it praised by his most inveterate enemies, as one of the finest specimens of the antique. Many a famous work of art owes its celebrity to the same trick; and many an artist is great because he died some centuries ago. Take, as an instance, the Venus de Medicis, in the Uffizzi gallery; consider it upon its intrinsic merits, and without reference to its historical interest. There are beauties in the figure which all must admit; yet the figure is not all. If Powers could be guilty of placing such a head upon any of his productions as that which disfigures this work, what would become of his reputation? He would be denounced as ignorant of the very rudiments of female beauty. Yet this head is considered in keeping with the form, and the face is pronounced by the critics to be the very perfection of beauty. Looking at it simply through the medium of nature, and without reference to the rules of art, it strikes me that it is much too small for the body; no such head, so far as my knowledge extends, was ever placed upon human shoulders, unless in a case of deformity. The features are puerile and destitute of character; there is no expression in the face either intellectual or voluptuous; nothing to awaken a single emotion in the heart of the beholder. Compared with the head and face of the Greek Slave, or of Psyche, by the same master